PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

The accounts in the present volume, taken along with the last two rolls in its predecessor, embrace a period of twenty-two years, extending from the first Exchequer audit after the return of David II. from his English captivity to the audit of March and April 1379. Excepting a gap in the year 1358, the rolls of the Chamberlain are complete. Of the accounts of the custumars and bailies of the burghs, those of 1370 and 1371 are wanting. We have occasional accounts of Clerks of Liverance and Clerks of the Wardrobe, three of the keeper of the Mint, and a few rolls relating to the contributions levied for the payment of David's ransom and other national purposes. Only one roll of the sheriffs applicable to this period has been preserved, that audited in 1359. The comparative paucity of extant sheriffs' accounts of this and later dates is probably owing to their place of deposit having been the Exchequer Buildings, which were partly consumed by fire in the early part of this century.

When Lord Hailes wrote his "Annals of Scotland," the chief sources of information open to him regarding this period were Bower's "Scotichronicon" and the documents bearing on Scotland in Rymer's "Fœdera." A very important addition was made to the material for the history of the latter part of David's reign by the discovery in the State Paper Office in London, and transmission to the Lord Register in 1793, of the manuscript known as the "Black Book," a collection of miscellaneous documents of great value, among which are large portions of the proceedings of the Parliaments of that period, now accessible in the record edition of the Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland. The contents of the "Black Book" were in the first instance printed in the suppressed volume known as "Robertson's Parliamentary Records," and in that shape Tytler had access to them; but from misunderstanding some passages, and endeavouring to reconcile others with the loose chronology of Bower, that historian was led into grave errors, which detract from the value of the second volume of his work.

The rolls now published serve to a large extent to clear up what was obscure, and supply what was wanting, in the "Black Book." Read in their light, the political history and sequence of events in this part of David's reign become comparatively simple and natural; and David's conduct, if not what might have been looked for from the son of Robert Bruce, becomes at least consistent and intelligible.

So overwhelming a calamity as the defeat of Durham, and captivity of the Sovereign, might have been expected to seal the fate of Scotland. But the spirit of resistance survived, and continued to baffle all Edward's schemes for reducing her to the position of a tributary state. A protracted negotiation for the King's ransom, often interrupted by hostilities, was at last concluded at Berwick on October 3, 1357, the Scots binding themselves to pay 100,000 marks to England by ten yearly instalments, the first of them due on the 25th of June 1358. There was to be a truce between the countries during the ten years allowed for the payment of the ransom money, and twenty members of the most distinguished families in Scotland were required to place themselves in the hands of the King of England as hostages for its payment.

Very soon after his release, in the month of November 1357,[1] David met his Parliament at Scone, to concert measures by which the exigency might be met. For a country situated as Scotland then was, the sum was an enormous one. Some, though not all, of the expedients by which it was resolved to raise it, are indicated in the portion of the record of this Parliament that has been preserved to us.[1] First comes a very singular provision. The King was empowered to purchase all the wools and fleeces in the kingdom at the price of four marks for every sack of wool or every 200 woolfells.[2] Directions followed for a revaluation of the lands and rents of both churchmen and laymen, and of corn, cattle, sheep, and goods of every kind, the survey to include further the names of all the mechanics, tradesmen, and artificers in the country.[3] A tax was to be laid on the rents and profits of land, in accordance with their real value as thus ascertained, and an inquiry was besides to be made how much each person was likely voluntarily to contribute. Regulations were made to prevent the sale or exportation of sheep and lambs during the time when the survey was being made.

[1] "Crastino Sancti Martini," vol. i. p. 545. The 12th of November is there specified as the date when the measure connected with the Crown lands was carried; but the 6th of that month, as given in the "Black Book," was probably the day on which Parliament met.

Then came a stringent provision for the resumption of the lands, rents, and other property of the Crown that had been alienated, with a prohibition of such alienation by the King in time coming, and even of the disposal of wards and escheats without mature advice. The duty on exportation of money was raised to half a mark on the pound.[4]

[1] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. p. 491.

[2] This was about two-thirds of the actual market price, which was £4, or six marks. In the accounts of 1367, 338 woolfells are sold for £5, 3s. 3d. (p. 294); in 1368, 100 for 40s. (p. 304); in 1374, 12 for 5s. (p. 453).

[3] This valuation was the basis of the new extent.

[4] The object of this tax was not so much revenue, as to prevent what was considered the source of the country's prosperity from being carried out of it. The burgh accounts of 1331 show that in that year, or earlier, a duty of 1s. on the

Not the least important enactment of that Parliament was one which the "Black Book" has not preserved to us, the raising of the great customs to three times their former amount.

Parliament met again at Scone on the 12th of October 1358;[1] but we have no record of its proceedings, which probably included those arrangements connected with the payment of the second instalment of the ransom which we see carried out in John Mercer's account.

In 1357, and for a year or two after it, the accounts inform us of purchases of wool by the King to the amount of nearly £2000; and doubtless further purchases would appear in the sheriffs' rolls of 1360 and 1361, if we had them. In every case, however, but one, where we are informed of the price paid per sack, it is not four but five marks.[2] The wool is uniformly said to have been resold to English merchants, not to foreigners, as Tytler suggests.[3] The proceeds of its sale are nowhere accounted for; but as a higher price would probably be got in England than the selling price in Scotland (which was about six marks), at least £1000 may well have been realised in this way.

pound had been imposed on the export of money (vol. i. pp. 350 et seq.). In 1341 the duty was 10d. on the pound (ibid. p. 474); in 1343, 3s. 4d. on the pound (ibid. p. 533). By a statute of 1369 it was again fixed at 3s. 4d. on the pound (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. p. 508); and there is no instance in the rolls of the higher tax imposed by the Act of 1359 being enforced.

The revaluing of property all over the country, and levying of an assessment on it, must have been a work of no small difficulty. We have no separate account of the first year's contribution; and the Chamberlain's account from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1358, in which some of the payments for it may have been entered, is wanting; that from Martinmas 1358 to April 1359 contains payments from the sheriffdoms amounting only to £84, 0s. 10d., and more than swallowed up by expenses and payments to the King.[1]

The sheriffs' roll,[2] audited March 1358–9, exhibits an attempt, though not absolutely without respect of persons, to enforce the law regarding the resumption of Crown lands;[3] but in a great many cases the dispossessed persons or their representatives were, nine years later, when a second similar Act was passed, found still in possession of the same lands.[4]

Prior to the Parliament of 1357 the ordinary

[1] Page 5. [2] Vol. i. p. 545.

[3] What lands were in the hands of the Queen, or of the King's sister and her husband the Earl of Sutherland, now a hostage in England, were allowed to be retained by them (vol. i. pp. 546, 551, 585), a reference to the King being, however, suggested as to the moiety of the thanage of Fermartin retained by Thomas Ysak (ibid. p. 551). Favour was also shown to the Countess of Wigtown (ibid. pp. 548, 576, 589), the Countess of Strathern, widow of Sir Maurice Moray, who had fallen at Durham (ibid. p. 576); Thomas Moray of Bothwell (ibid. pp. 576, 582), one of the hostages for the King; and Lawrence of Gelibrand, steward of the Queen's house (ibid. p. 585). The possessor was sometimes allowed to retain the rents for this term only, as in the case of the Earl of Douglas (ibid. pp. 567, 569); or the King was to be consulted, as in that of William of Keith, possessor of the forest of Cowie (ibid. p. 586). In some cases, as that of John of Ramsay and Lady Eva Fleming (ibid. p. 589), the sheriff, who had not ventured to dispossess the occupants, was ordered to do so.

rate of customs on exports had been half a mark on the sack of wool, 3s. 4d. on the hundred woolfells, and a mark on the last of hides. From the burgh accounts audited in March 1358–9 and in April 1360, we gather: 1. That the Parliament of 1357 had doubled the customs on all these articles from April or Whitsunday 1358, it being arranged that the double duty should go to pay for the purchases of wool made by the King. 2. That triple custom (that is, 20s. on the sack of wool, 10s. on the 100 woolfells, and 3 marks on the last of hides) began to be levied on woolfells at Michaelmas 1358, on hides at Martinmas 1358, and on wools at Whitsunday 1359, the whole triple custom going without deduction to the payment of the ransom. In the burgh accounts of 1359 the whole triple custom is retained in the hands of the custumars for the payment of the second instalment of the ransom; and it reappears in the debit side of their accounts in 1360.[1] In the last-named accounts, large payments are made from the triple custom to John Mercer, agent in Flanders for the payment of the King's ransom; and in some cases half of the triple duty is retained "ex convencione,"[2] an expression apparently denoting a sale of part of the custom to the burgesses.

[1] How the first instalment was met the existing rolls do not inform us; perhaps the missing account of the Chamberlain might have explained the matter. Edward's receipt however, makes it certain that the 10,000 marks was punctually paid on St John's Day 1358 (Fœdera, iii. p. 397).

[2] Pages 10, 12, 16, 17.

The second yearly instalment was paid, not in accordance with the treaty on St John's Day 1359 at Berwick, but at Bruges on three different dates, the second and third of which were October 30th and December 23d, 1359,[1] payment being made by John Mercer and Roger Hog as representing David to John Walewyn as agent to the English king.

The Chamberlain, in his account of 1360, acknowledges receipts amounting to £1578, 4s. 5d. from the sheriffdoms, and £189, 2s. 9d. from the burghs, on behalf of the second contribution,[2] of which only £663 seem to have come into Mercer's hands.[3]

It is from Mercer's account,[4] audited 24th July

[4] Page 54. John Mercer, a burgess of Perth, and probably the wealthiest trader in Scotland, may be cited as a prominent example of a distinctive feature of Scottish life in feudal times, the absence of any broad line of social demarcation between the merchant burgess and the landed man. Engaged in trade all his life, and a custumar and the chief magistrate of Perth, he was also a considerable landowner, and married to a Murray of Tullibardine. He was sent to Flanders in connection with the arrangements for the payment of the King's ransom, the management of which was entrusted to his care; and he seems also to have been employed in a political mission to the Low Countries in 1366. In the reign of Robert II. he appears as an envoy to the Court of England, and he temporarily discharged the duties of Chamberlain for a year, during a vacancy in that office. In 1376 a ship of Mercer's, in which he was returning from abroad, was wrecked on the Northumbrian coast, when his merchandise was seized by the English, and himself imprisoned in Scarborough Castle; in atonement for which flagrant breach of the truce we find 2000 marks set off against the termly payment of the ransom money in 1377 (page 582). An interesting letter by William Earl of Douglas to Edward III., in French, remonstrating against Mercer's incarceration, and requesting the pecuniary redress alluded to, is facsimiled in the National MSS. of Scotland, vol. ii. No. 45. "Mercer was liberated," says Walsingham (vol. i. p. 369), "to the great loss of the whole kingdom; for if he had been held to ransom as a prisoner of war, he would have enriched the king and kingdom with his inestimable wealth." The compensation seems, however, not to have satisfied Mercer's son

1360, that we are enabled to form an idea of the funds from which payment was actually made. These were principally: 1. The receipts from the custumars, expected to amount to 5000 marks, and supplemented by the Chamberlain to the extent of £333, 6s. 8d., in case of their falling short of that sum. 2. The price of half the customs on wool for the succeeding year, purchased in advance by the burgesses, from which source another 5000 marks were expected, also supplemented to the extent of £533, 6s. 8d. by the Chamberlain.[1] Mercer's whole receipts amounted to £7340, 5s. 8½d.; but as a large part of that sum did not come to hand till after payment had to be made, he had to pay £115, 5s. as interest on a loan of £1166, 13s. 4d., besides £62 as penalty for the delay in payment already alluded to, and costs of messengers and agents sent to England to arrange the postponement.

The third instalment of 10,000 marks was punctually paid at Berwick on the 24th June 1360;[2] but here, as in the case of the first payment, we are left in the dark as to how the money was obtained.

Andrew, who in the following year retaliated by heading a squadron of armed vessels of Spain, France, and Scotland, that scoured the English seas, and attacked and plundered Scarborough. He and his fleet were captured by a London merchant named Philpot, who was reimbursed out of a Parliamentary subsidy granted in October 1377. In 1385 Andrew (now Sir Andrew) Mercer was a man of sufficient mark to be chosen as umpire in a dispute between Robert Earl of Fife and Menteith and Sir John Logie, which he decided in favour of the latter. His descendants, the Mercers of Aldie, were a not undistinguished baronial family, now represented by the Marchioness of Lansdowne as heir of line.

[1] This payment does not appear in the Chamberlain's account.

[2] Fœdera, iii. p. 500.

The balance of the customs accounts of the succeeding years was paid to the Chamberlain. No doubt we have a roll containing a detailed account of the third contribution from goods, chattels, corn, rents, and workmen;[1] and the Chamberlain, in his account of 1361, enters his receipts from the third contribution as £2220, 19s. 4d. from the sheriffdoms, £609, 12s. 10½d. from the clergy, and £337, 16s. 9½d. from the burghs; but these receipts are all absorbed in ordinary debts and expenses, except a payment to Mercer, forming part of the fund from which the second instalment was paid.

For the next few years, though contributions from churchmen appear on the debit side of the Chamberlain's accounts, no further payments were made towards the extinction of the debt: but to understand the financial position of the two countries it is necessary to have some idea of their political relations.

In 1355 Edward Balliol, driven out of Scotland for the last time, made a formal surrender of his rights to the Scottish Kingdom and Crown to the King of England. This transaction was considered to invest Edward III. with a quasi-title to the throne of Scotland; and throughout the negotiations, and in the receipts for the ransom, he never, but in one or two exceptional instances, acknowledged David as King of Scots, always affecting to style him "David of Bruce, our dear brother." Otherwise, it was his policy to treat his captive and brother-in-law with distinction, and to make his enforced residence in England agreeable to him. David had been but a few months at large, when he asked and obtained permission to revisit England; and year after year he continued to pay long and expensive visits to the English Court, and take his part in its fêtes and splendours. Experience had taught Edward that Scotland was not to be brought under subjection by superior force; and his tactics were now directed towards conciliating the Scottish King and people, and inducing them to barter their independence for an acquittance of their pecuniary obligations. He set himself to promote friendly intercourse between the countries, and lent a helping hand to the development of Scottish commerce. From the War of Succession down to 1348 the Scots had been jealously excluded from trading with England: in that year the truce of Calais opened up commercial intercourse between the two kingdoms; and it was followed by a series of measures conferring important privileges on the merchants of Scotland. And while the traders and manufacturers of the great towns were becoming rich, the youths of the upper classes were encouraged to resort to the English universities; and numerous passports were granted to the nobility and gentry to visit England, often under the pretext of a pilgrimage to St Thomas of Canterbury, or some other favourite shrine.

But against all this had to be set the incubus of the ransom money, the King's inability to live within his income,[1] and the cost of missions to England year after year for the purpose of negotiation. Hopeless of being able to fulfil unaided their obligations to England, the nation, and even the King, turned their eyes for a time towards the Continent. The discharge side of the Chamberlain's account for the period between April 1359 and May 1360 includes payments of £203, 6s. 8d. to Sir Robert of Erskine, and £80 to Norman of Lesley, for the expense of journeys to the Courts of France and Rome on the King's affairs;[2] and there is a further payment to Erskine in the next year's account of £71, 6s. 8d. for his expenses at the two Courts.[3] The mission to Avignon was to obtain the Pope's sanction to levy a tenth from the rents of the church in aid of the ransom;[4] the negotiations with France are explained by a manuscript account of them in the Advocates' Library. On the side of Scotland it was

[1] Before 1361 David had pledged a portion of the Crown jewels to Paul of Metteneye, a Flemish merchant: in the Chamberlain's account of that year there occurs a payment of £106, 13s. 4d. to redeem them (p. 80), a sum which, however, found its way into the King's hands, and was diverted by him to some other purpose (p. 263). Queen Joanna's jewels were also in pawn for a debt due by her to Thomas of Fawside, an instalment of which, amounting to £100, was paid in 1362 (p. 115).

[3] Page 77.

[4] A separate mission to the Roman Court was entrusted to Friar Adam of Lanark, the King's Confessor (pp. 99, 129). That the Papal sanction for the contribution was obtained appears from the rolls, p. 109. The boon was accorded for three years only, and with the proviso, that the clergy should be no further taxed for the ransom. "Nevertheless, when so much had been got, all the lands and temporalities held from the King or otherwise by churchmen, were by the King's directions made to contribute, together with the barons and other freeholders of the kingdom, though the clergy made a strong stand against this" (Fordun, Annalia, clxxx.).

offered to renew the war with England, if the French should furnish the necessary aid to discharge the ransom. The French replied that, exposed as they were to war, and with their King a captive, the most they could do was to contribute half of the ransom money, and that on the condition that the Scots should ratify the old alliance, and at once renew the war.[1] But these stipulations were never fulfilled. An English invasion of France followed, in which several of the Scots nobility appeared in the ranks of the enemy,[2] and the campaign was brought to a close by the Treaty of Bretigny, in terms of which the French renounced the Scottish, and the English the Flemish, alliance.

The Scottish King and his councillors were once more thrown into the arms of England. In the Chamberlain's account for 1361 we find £520 paid to certain envoys travelling to London and York with the view of effecting a treaty with the Eng-

[1] In the Chamberlain's account rendered May 1360, 13s. 6d. is paid "Stephano de Cellario pro scriptura indenturarum super convencionem inter dominum nostrum regem et regentem Francie" (p. 52).

[2] Thomas Stewart, Earl of Angus, one of the restless spirits of the time, Chamberlain in 1357, and a hostage for the King of Scots under the Treaty of Berwick, got on 8th August 1359 a safe-conduct for four ships of Flanders, with which he engaged to join Edward at Calais (Fœdera, iii. p. 441), Mercer paying him £166, 13s. 4d. by precept of the King of Scots (p. 55). But he broke his engagement, and was in March 1359–60 charged by Edward to return to England to fulfil his obligation as a hostage. Remaining in Scotland, he soon afterwards fell under suspicion of having had a hand in the murder of David's mistress, Katherine Mortimer, and was imprisoned in Dumbarton Castle. He there died of the plague, and in the Chamberlain's account of 1362 we have an entry of £40 paid to the keeper of the fortress for the expense of his maintenance and his funeral (p. 167).

lish.[1] These were Patrick of Leuchars, Bishop of Brechin and Chancellor; Sir Robert of Erskine, one of the most faithful of David's advisers, who had been Chamberlain most of the time between the battle of Durham and his return from captivity, and had borne a prominent part in the negotiations for his ransom; Walter of Wardlaw, the King's secretary, Archdeacon of Lothian and afterwards Bishop of Glasgow; and Sir John of Preston: and in the succeeding account the Chamberlain credits himself with sums amounting to £313, 6s. 8d., paid to the Chancellor, Erskine, and Wardlaw, with William Landale, Bishop of St Andrews, and Norman of Lesley, for their expenses at another Conference at York.[2]

In 1361, when a visitation of pestilence drove the King of Scots to the northern part of his dominions, the Earl of Mar in some not thoroughly explained way incurred his resentment. The castle of Kildrummy was captured by David and delivered to the keeping of Sir Walter of Moigne.[3] The Earl, who had to retire from the country for a time, returned under the condition, according to the "Scalacronica,"[4] of paying £1000 to the King at the expiry of five years. It would seem, however, from the accounts of 1364, that Kildrummy was at that date still in the hands of the King and custody of Moigne, to whom the Chamberlain makes a payment of salt for the garrison;[1] and in the same account we find a payment of £666, 13s. 4d. (1000 marks) made to the Earl of Mar by agreement between him and the King regarding the lands of the earldom.[2] According to the "Scalacronica,"[3] the quarrel between the King and the Earl of Mar originated in a single combat at Edinburgh between the Earl and Sir William Keith, in which David unfairly showed favour to the latter. It may also have been known to David, as Lord Hailes suggests, that Edward had induced the Earl by a pension of 600 marks to bind himself to serve him in his wars against all men except his liege lord.[4]

The capture of Kildrummy acted as an outlet to pent-up elements of disaffection that were rife in the country. An examination of the various accounts regarding the contribution will show what substantial grounds there were for the complaint that, after the estates had agreed to tax themselves so heavily for the ransom, the sums collected were mainly absorbed by David's private expenses. On this plea the Earl of Douglas took up arms, seized the castle of Dirleton, then in the King's hands from ward, and entered into a formal band with the Earl of March, the Steward, and the eldest and second sons of the latter, to compel their sovereign to change his counsellors. The flame of civil war was soon lit up, and the confederates plundered and imprisoned the adherents of the King. The "Scalacronica" mentions "Ethirkenyn"[1] as the scene of one of the conflicts of the time, a place which the rolls enable us to identify as Inverkeithing: in the accounts of that burgh there is an allowance for twelve shillings seized from the bailies along with other property, "per adherentes comitis de Douglas, tempore quo villam de Inverkethyn invasit de nocte."[2] David, assembling his forces at Edinburgh,[3] by a sudden march surprised Douglas at Lanark; and his promptitude and energy brought the insurrection to a speedy close. The Steward swore fealty at Inchmurdach on the 4th May 1363, in an instrument which has been preserved by Bower,[4] and Douglas and March separately made their submission.

A few months after the suppression of this formidable rising, on 6th October 1363,[5] David repaired to London with Wardlaw and Gilbert Armstrong,[6] a churchman who held the post of [5] The exact date is given in the heading of an account for the expenses of Queen Margaret in the King's absence, p. 183.

[6] £1337, 7s. 3d. was on this occasion paid for the King's expenses in London, going, staying, and returning, besides £97 to the Clerk of Liverance (p. 173); and £23, 6s. 8d. was paid through the custumars of Edinburgh to Wardlaw and Armstrong, travelling with the King to London (p. 130).

Steward of his household,[1] when a plan was matured, which had, perhaps, been under discussion at the Conference at York, of bringing about an eventual union of the Crowns of England and Scotland. The heads of the scheme, as agreed on of date 27th November 1363, have been preserved.[2] It stipulates for the immediate discharge of the ransom money, on condition of the Crown of Scotland being settled on Edward III. in default of David's issue-male, careful and elaborate provision being made for preserving the separate usages and institutions of the kingdom. The idea probably commended itself to David, who was childless, and jealous of the superior regard shown by the Scots to his nephew and presumptive heir; and Edward hoped or expected that the freedom from that excessive taxation which had been the cause of the late outbreak might recommend it to the body of the nation also. The King of Scots engaged to sound the inclinations of his people, and inform Edward of the result fifteen days after the coming Easter. A Parliament was accordingly assembled at Scone on the 4th March following. According to Wyntoun's account,[3] the form in which the proposal was put by David was, that not Edward, but one of Edward's sons, should be his heir; and Bower adds that he especially recommended Prince Lionel.[4] The fragmentary record of the Parliament says nothing of this, but corroborates the assertion of the chroniclers, that the proposal met with a decided and peremptory rejection. Parliament however was disposed to make important concessions in the interests of peace, and sent Erskine, Armstrong, and Wardlaw as negotiators, £213, 6s. 8d. being paid down by the Chamberlain for their expenses.[1]

Although the records of both Conference and Parliament bear their own dates, it has strangely happened that all our modern historians have fallen into the error of making the latter precede the former, and have, with like violation of historical sequence, treated the insurrection of 1363 as the result of the proposal made by David to alter the succession. Lord Hailes, who wrote before the "Black Book" had been brought to light, was misled by Bower's mistake of a year as to the date of the Parliament; but it is less easy to understand how Tytler, who prints the minute of the Parliament with its true date in his appendix, should have failed to apprehend the sequence of events.[2] It would, indeed, have argued little less than infatuation on David's part had he so utterly disregarded the unanimous feeling of the nation as to renew a project which would of necessity be resisted to the last by the Steward and his friends, whose recent outbreak had so nearly cost him his throne.

II.

On the 25th December 1357, Edward III. granted a safe-conduct to England to Joanna, wife of David Bruce, with the Bishop of St Andrews and the Earl of March.[1] Queen Joanna did not again return to Scotland, but died near London five years later, on 14th August 1362.[2]

Five months subsequently, on the 20th January 1362–3, the Great Seal Register contains a charter by David of an annuity of £5 from the barony of Banchory Devenick to the Dominican Friars of Aberdeen, "pro salute anime mee et dilecte mee Margarete de Logy."[3] Margaret, however, was not then married to the King; the designation given her does not consist with such a supposition; and her first husband, Sir John Logie, was still alive.

According to the "Scalacronica," a contemporary authority, "this riot being subdued for the time, the said David took to wife dame Margaret of Logy, a lady who had been formerly married, and had already lived with him: that marriage was made solely by the power of love, which conquers

[2] These particulars appear in the MS. of Fordun in the Cottonian collection, which Mr Skene considers to have been written in 1363 (Fordun, Edit. Skene, vol. i. pp. 380, xxx. xlv.). They are corroborated by Walsingham, vol. i. p. 298; and there is independent evidence of the Queen having been alive in May 1362 (Fœdera, iii. p. 647).

all."[1] Bower also dates the marriage immediately after the suppression of the insurrection;[2] and, unlikely as it might a priori seem that David was newly married at the time when Edward proposed to remit the ransom money on the contingency of a succession dependent on his dying without issue, there can be no doubt that such was the fact. The heading of an account for the expenses of the Queen during the King's absence in England, and from his return to the Parliament at Scone in March 1363–4,[3] and a corresponding entry in the account of the Chamberlain,[4] seem to show that the marriage had taken place before October 1363; though this evidence is perhaps not absolutely conclusive; for if during part of the time Margaret had been the King's mistress, she would still be styled Queen in the account, as being so at the date when it was rendered. But the occurrence in the "Rotuli Scotiæ" of a safe-conduct, dated 20th February 1363–4, to Margaret, wife of David of Bruce, to visit the shrine of St Thomas of Canterbury,[5] puts it beyond doubt that the marriage preceded the Scone Parliament.

Fordun calls David's second Queen "quandam magnam dominam nomine Margretam de Logy, honestam" (some manuscripts read "honestis," which is more probably what Fordun meant) "ac nobilibus ortam natalibus de regno suo oriundam."[1] Wyntoun calls her simply "Dame Mergret off Logy."[2] Bower, as edited by Goodall, styles her "daughter"; some manuscripts, however, giving the alternative reading of "widow" of John Logy;[3] and the "Liber Pluscardensis" rightly calls her "Margaretam de Logi, filiam domini Malcolmi de Drummond."[4] She was, indeed, as stated by the authority last quoted, aunt of Annabella Drummond, the Queen of Robert III.; and had she left a fairer name, later generations would not have forgot—as strange to say they have done—that the Drummond family gave not one Queen but two to Scotland.

[1] "Et cest riot pur le temps ensi enmesez, le dit David prist en espouse dame Margaret de Logy, un dame qautre foitz avoit este marie, qe oue ly avoit devaunt demurrez; cest matrimoigne fust fait soulement per force damours, qe toutz veint" (Scalacronica, p. 203).

The late Mr Riddell, though he failed to discover Margaret's parentage, established by charter evidence that she was the widow, not, as most historians had agreed to call her, the daughter, of a Logie, and that she had a son grown up at the time of her marriage.[5] Twelve years ago the present editor, unaware of the parentage assigned her in the "Liber Pluscardensis" (then in manuscript and little consulted or regarded), or of the indirect corroborative evidence in the present record, arrived, from armorial considerations alone, at the conclusion that she was a Drummond, and ventured an assertion to that effect in an article in Macmillan's Magazine for June 1867.[6]

Sir John Logie, executed in 1320 for his share in the Foulis conspiracy, was grandfather of Margaret's first husband; and his forfeited estates of Logie and Strathgartney, or at least Strathgartney, were conferred by Robert Bruce on Ellen of Mar and her husband, Sir John of Menteith.[1] But in 1339, when the adherents of Edward Balliol surrendered Perth to the Steward, one of the conditions of the capitulation was that Logie's son should be restored to his father's lands; and David in consequence reconveyed Strathgartney to important light which the study of arms sometimes throws on historical questions. On a beautiful but much defaced seal of Queen Margaret in the Record Office in London, are, in addition to a full length figure of the Queen, three separate armorial shields. One bears the arms of Scotland. Of the other two, which may be presumed to contain her paternal arms and those of her former husband, one has been so injured as to be not very decipherable; the other is the well-known bearing of Drummond, three bars wavy; or rather, as represented in early times, Barry wavy of six. Nisbet no doubt, on the authority of Sir James Balfour, Lyon in the time of Charles I., assigns to the family of Logie of that Ilk the coat of the Drummonds with a change of colour; Sable, three bars wavy or. But Balfour was a credulous and easily satisfied herald. In describing seals which he had seen in the public records or elsewhere, he habitually allowed himself to supply the tinctures at will: and his armorial manuscript referred to by Nisbet—now in the Advocates' Library—indicates that he assigned this coat to the family of Logie solely on the authority of the seal referred to. Believing Margaret to have been a Logie by birth, he assumed these to be her paternal arms, and took the liberty of altering the colours to distinguish it from the Drummond coat. While no earlier authority assigns a coat resembling this to the family of Logie, there is some discrepancy in existing armorial manuscripts as to the arms borne by them, arising apparently out of a confusion between the names Logie, Lockie, and Leckie. The name of Lockie is in point of fact not historically known in Scotland; Loghi (a very usual orthography in old charters) might readily, in the careless transcription characteristic of the manuscripts alluded to, pass into Locki; and the half obliterated coat on the seal seems to correspond with one of the blazons given under the name of Lockie or Locki: Argent, on a fess sable three roses of the field.

John of Logie in 1344.[1] The Menteiths again temporarily obtained possession under a charter granted in 1359, the reconveyance narrating that Strathgartney had been wrongfully taken from them "per suggestionem quorundam."[2]

But the King's liaison with Margaret that preceded this marriage brought both Logies and Drummonds into favour. In the account of the Chamberlain, extending from 1st April 1363 to 11th December 1364, there occurs a gift "Johanni de Logy, seniori,"[3] who must therefore have been alive when the King granted the above-mentioned annuity to the Dominicans of Aberdeen; and about the same date are various gifts and remissions of custom to the Queen's youngest brother, Maurice of Drummond,[4] ancestor of the Drummonds of Megginch. The Logies were again put in possession of Logie and Strathgartney; and on 12th April 1364 the thanedom of Tannadice and reversion of Glammis were conferred on Margaret's son John of Logie, "domino ejusdem,"[5] who, in the following year, had a charter of Foulis, Gask, and other lands from the Steward, as Earl of Strathern.[6] At the Parliament of July 1366, Logie, then held by him from the Steward, was, on his resignation and the Steward's, regranted to him as a Crown holding,[1] a charter a few years later giving him the full rights of barony in respect of them.[2] A further important territorial possession was conferred on him by David in the same Parliament of 1366, namely, the whole lands in Annandale which Robert I. had bestowed on his nephew the Earl of Moray.[3] The lordship of Annandale, or rather the greater part of it,[4] was then in possession of the English; but the Earl of March, in virtue of his wife, Randolph's daughter, had a right to it that would have revived on the expulsion of the enemy: the gift to John of Logie was therefore a flagrant injustice, and one calculated to rouse the hostility of the Earl of March and other great nobles. Queen Margaret and her son were thus driven to strengthen their position by alliances with such families of consideration as could be induced to identify themselves with their cause; and we have a curious glimpse of the state of the country in the document in the Errol charterchest adduced by Mr Riddell in evidence of Margaret's previous marriage, in which Kennedy of Dunure obliges himself to be "de retinencia" of Margaret and her son all his life, and to warn them of all plots and snares against

[4] The English rule cannot have extended over the whole district so called. Entries occur for the King's expenses "variis vicibus" in Annandale, amounting in 1366 to £67, 9s. 4d. and in 1367 to £82, 9s. 7d. (pp. 263, 295). them in Scotland generally, but more especially in the lordship of Annandale.[1]

The Queen herself, Fordun tells us, was "endowed by David with many lands and possessions.[2] Her dowry included the customs of Inverkeithing from July 1364,[3] and of Aberdeen from May 1364,[4] the fermes of Inverkeithing from July 1364,[5] of Aberdeen for Whitsunday 1364 and succeeding terms,[6] and of Kinghorn.[7] She had also the fermes of Banff in 1367;[8] and she enjoyed the rents of the constabulary of Kinghorn.[9] She had her Chamberlain, William of Calabre,[10] her Clerk of Liverance,[11] and her Clerk of the Wardrobe.[12] We have an enumeration of the lands conveyed to her in Perthshire,[13] which included the thanage of Kinclevin, Abernyt, Fardell, Rate, Lethendy, Glasclone, Balcarne, Cockreske, the "abthania" of Dull, of which her brother John of Drummond was bailie,[14] and which she conveyed to her son;[15] and Stobhall, Car-

[1] Riddell's Scottish Peerage and Constitutional Law, p. 982. A few words may be added as to the later history of the Logie family. They did not succeed in retaining Annandale, which was in the next generation in the hands of the Earl of March. The Queen's son, however, kept possession of Logie and Strathgartney, and vindicated her right to them in 1385 against the Earl of Fife and Menteith (afterwards Duke of Albany), who, in virtue of the award of a submission to Andrew Mercer of Mickleour (son of John Mercer) had to give them up to John of Logie. The line ended in the following century in an heiress, who married a younger son of the Earl of Errol. The heirs of the marriage eventually succeeded to the earldom; and the Earl of Errol is therefore Queen Margaret's descendant and heir of line.

gill, and Kinloch, which she betowed on her nephew, Malcolm of Drummond.[1] It would thus appear that Stobhall and Cargill, which in the generally accepted accounts of the Drummond family are said to have come into their possession by marriage with a Montfitchet heiress, were in reality obtained by gift from Queen Margaret.

Margaret seems to have soon become the head of a political faction, opposed to the Steward and the Earls of Douglas and March; and under her influence the extravagant expenditure of the Court became more a grievance than ever. In the course of four years she got five protections from Edward for visits to England, to be made with a large retinue, and as pilgrimages to St Thomas of Canterbury.[2] Agreeably to another usage of that age, she anticipated her funeral by having a tomb of alabaster brought from London and erected at Dunfermline, along with a similar monument to David.[3]

Her last pilgrimage passport was granted 4th January 1367–8, in conjunction with one to her husband: David's next safe-conduct to England, dated 2d February 1368–9,[4] is without her. At the Exchequer audit of January 1368–9 she is still

"domina regina,"[1] though deprived of her Chancellor; at that of January 1369–70 she is "Margareta de Logy quondam regina;"[2] and an entry in the Chamberlain's account seems to indicate the 20th March 1369–70 as the date of her divorce,[3] which nearly corresponds with the account in the "Scotichronicon."[4]

Bower's assertion that David was induced by her to imprison the heir to the throne and the three eldest of his sons in separate fortresses[5] has at least this basis of truth, that the Steward and his third son Alexander were both incarcerated by the King's command in Lochleven Castle. That the "Wolf of Badenach" may have rendered himself amenable to the law to an extent that made his confinement a justifiable act seems far from improbable. The rolls indicate that he was three weeks in prison before the audit of 20th January 1368–9, and probably a longer time after it, inasmuch as the expenses of his custody prior to that date amount to 21s., and subsequently to it to £4.[6] The Steward's incarceration is, on the other hand, shown by the accounts to have been at an end before the audit of 1368–9; and there is also evidence that it began after the Parliament of June 1368. For two or three years previously to that Parliament, the islands of Scotland and the districts of Athole, Badenach, Lochaber, and Ross had been in a state bordering on rebellion. The royal authority had been defied by the northern lords, who had refused to pay their share of the national contribution, deforced the collectors, and contumaciously absented themselves from the meeting of the estates. One of the most prominent offenders, John lord of the Isles, was son-in-law of the Steward; and at the Parliament of 1368 we find the Steward, as lord of Strathern, and his sons John and Robert as lords of Kyle and Monteith, enjoined not to allow criminals to be harboured in their respective domains; and John of the Isles commanded "per modum tactum inter ipsum et Senescallum" to present himself and give security for his conduct:[1] and we know that it was not till November in the following year that the lord of the Isles was induced to tender his submission. The Parliamentary proceedings at this time seem to indicate a disposition on the King's part to inculpate the Steward, as well as the Earls of March and Douglas—the heads of the party opposed to Margaret—in the disorders of the Highlands: and if it was on the pretext of encouragement given by him to the northern rebels that the heir to the throne was put under arrest, it may be probably conjectured that he was restored to liberty as soon as Margaret's influence was virtually at an end.

There seems no particular reason for supposing that Margaret was divorced on other than the

then usual ground of divorce—consanguinity or affinity within the forbidden degrees. We do not know enough of the ancestors on all sides of either Drummonds or Logies to be able to explain the relationship; but it is worth noting that, in a charter granted to John of Logie by the Steward, whose maternal relations were the same as those of David, and also in a precept by Robert Earl of Fife and Menteith, he is called "dilectus consanguineus noster."[1]

What brought about the change in the King's feelings towards Margaret that led him to look about for an available plea for divorcing her is a separate question. Indications are not wanting of her having been superseded by a new favourite, namely, Agnes of Dunbar, daughter of the Earl of March, who in the succeeding reign became wife of Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith.[2] The "Liber Pluscardensis" asserts that the divorce was procured "eo quod ipsa impregnatam esse finxit et non fuit;[3] and if this ambitious woman had really

[2] Payments occur in the Aberdeen accounts of 1369 for spices delivered to Agnes of Dunbar in the King's absence (p. 328); a payment of £25, 2s. 5½d. to the same lady in the King's absence occurs in the Chamberlain's account of the same year (p. 345); and in the following year there is an entry of £66, 13s. 4d. for her expenses (p. 357). Shortly before his death David granted her, "pro apparatu et amictu ipsius," an annual rent of 300 marks from the fermes and customs of Aberdeen (Robertson's Index, p. 53, No. 32). The precept (printed in the "Registrum Honoris de Morton," vol. ii. p. 84) is dated 21st January 1370–1. No payments to account of this annuity occur in the custumars' accounts; but the burgh rolls of the first year of Robert II. are wanting; and the allowance probably ceased on her marriage. The last occurrence of her name in the Exchequer rolls is in the first Chamberlain's account of Robert's reign, in which £69, 10s. 2d. are paid her (p. 364).

formed the scheme of palming off a false heir on the country, she had a strong motive for getting the Steward and his family out of the way.

The evidence on which the divorce was procured was probably assailable in some point, and known to be so. Yet it seems to have been hoped that Margaret would be satisfied to remain in Scotland with the provision of £100 a year, which the rolls tell us had been settled on her by the King;[1] and her secret and unexpected departure[2] to prosecute her appeal before the Pope embarrassed and alarmed the Government. A trusted envoy, John of Peebles, afterwards Bishop of Dunkeld and Chancellor of Scotland, was immediately sent to Avignon. The first account after the divorce contains a payment of £40 to Peebles going to the Court of Rome on the affairs of the King;[3] and we find a further sum of £75, 13s. paid him the following year for the further cost of his mission.[4] This appeal would also form one of the subjects of discussion with the envoys from France, who arrived in Scotland in 1369.[5] A further sum of £1840 was paid in 1370 to ambassadors proceeding to the French and Papal Courts;[6] and in 1373 another mission was sent to Avignon at a cost of £466, 13s. 4d.[7] All these embassies were doubtless connected with Margaret's appeal, which was, nevertheless, triumphantly successful. Margaret was, to some extent, aided with gold borrowed at Avignon from English merchants, and apparently supplied by the English Government,[1] else the bond for it would not be among the English archives: but she appears to have owed her success with Gregory XI. more to the urgency of her suit and the justice of her cause. It seems strange that the quashing of the divorce after David's death should have involved such grave consequences to the country in which it was pronounced; but in January 1374–5 we find Robert II. imploring the intervention of Charles V. of France, to obtain a recal from the Pope of the decree reversing the Scottish sentence;[2] and it has been said that Scotland would have been subjected to an interdict, but for Margaret's opportune decease.[3] If the writings in the process of appeal, which, according to Bower, were as voluminous as four psalters,[4] still exist in the archives of the Vatican, a perusal of them would doubtless throw additional light on the singular career of Margaret Logie.[5]

it indispensable that immediate and vigorous measures should be taken for discharging the remainder of the ransom money. On the 13th January 1364–5, on the return of the three envoys who had been despatched to inform Edward of the light in which the Scottish estates viewed his proposal, a general Council was assembled at Perth to deliberate how the country could be extricated from its difficulties. That assembly expressed a willingness to grant large concessions to England, including the restoration of the disinherited lords, and the settlement of the Isle of Man and the possessions of the Balliols on one of Edward's sons, if the unpaid balance of the ransom were wholly remitted. It was agreed te send back the envoys with authority to propose these terms to Edward, and, in event of their not being accepted, to make three alternative suggestions as to the mode of payment.[1] The Council, as the accounts tell us, further ordered a contribution of 1000 marks for the envoys.[2]

Armed with these fresh powers, Erskine, Ward-

[1] These all, it may be observed, proceeded on the assumption that the sum already paid, which we know to have been 30,000 marks, was only 20,000. They were: 1. That 120,000 marks should be paid in yearly instalments of 5000 marks. 2. That 5000 marks should be paid yearly till the whole payments amounted to £100,000. 3. That 10,000 marks should be paid annually for the succeeding ten years, making a sum of 100,000 marks in addition to the payments already made. In connection with this last alternative, it was computed that the customs on wool would furnish 8000 marks; and that the remaining £2000 might be raised by a general contribution of 6d. on the pound, the balance of which should remain in the Chamberlain's hands for the King's necessary expenses.—Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 495, 496.

law, and Armstrong returned to England, along with the Bishop of St Andrews; their passport bore date 12th February 1365:[1] and the result of their deliberation with Commissioners appointed by Edward was a treaty ratified by the King of Scots on the 12th, and by the King of England on the 20th June 1365, containing an engagement to pay £100,000 by yearly instalments of 6000 marks (£4000), but agreeing to a truce for four years only, at the expiry of which time either party might, on six months' previous notice, renew the war. Should that renewal be on the part of England, it was further stipulated that no larger a sum than 80,000 marks, which was reckoned to be the balance due under the obligation of 1357, should be exigible.[2]

To the Scots, however, it was matter of such moment to have either a peace or a truce for a longer period, that at a Council held at Perth soon after the signature of the treaty,[3] the envoys were sent back to England with powers to make further concessions. It was probably at this Council that an arrangement was made, that the customs of each year from the 19th of June[4] till the audit in January following should be paid without deduction, and exclusively appropriated to the ransom, while a contribution should be made from the three estates for the King's expenses.

At the succeeding audit—that of January 1365–6—the customs' account of each burgh[1] is, agreeably to this arrangement, divided into two parts, corresponding to the first and second half of the year, without, however, an exact adherence in all cases to the 19th of June as the day of division; and while the balance of the first part is paid into the Chamberlain's ordinary account, the whole receipts of the second part are paid into a separate account of the Chamberlain for the ransom money, which contains on the charge side this reserved custom, supplemented to a small extent from the Chamberlain's ordinary account, to make up the 6000 marks or £4000 paid to the King of England, which forms its discharge side. In the Chamberlain's ordinary account of January 1365–6, the receipts of the contribution from the sheriffdoms amount to £1352, 13s. 6d., from the clergy to £602, 7s. 1d., and from the burghs to the pre-arranged sum of 1000 marks, or £666, 13s. 4d.[2]

But Edward looked for greater concessions than the Scots were as yet prepared for before he would hear of a permanent peace. A Council which met at Holyrood in May 1366 alluded to homage and demembration of the kingdom as conditions named to the envoys which it would be as impossible to accede as to alteration of the succession: but a further proposal of subsidising the English by an armed force was admitted to consideration. The Estates were prepared, if necessary, to arrange for the payment of the whole ransom money within the four years of the truce, by means of a tax imposed on the whole lands of the country, lay and ecclesiastical; and it was ordered that the valuations, old and new, of all the lands in the kingdom should be presented to the next Parliament.[1]

Parliament met at Scone on the succeeding July,[2] when the new valuation ordered — namely, that which had been made under the provisions of the Act of 1357—was laid before it, and orders were given for a further valuation of the property of burgesses and husbandmen, to be presented to the Council which was to meet at Edinburgh on the 8th September following. £8000 were in the meantime to be raised by contribution for the debts and expenses of the King and the expenses of the envoys, who were again sent back to England to negotiate for a permanent peace or a twenty-five years' truce. The 6000 marks due on Candlemas following were to be paid, as at the preceding term, out of the great custom; but after the return of the envoys the produce of the tax was to be made available for this annual payment, 1000 marks being taken from the same fund to pay the King's debts and expenses, and another 1000 for the expenses of the envoys. The 2000 marks for the last-named purposes being urgently required, were ordered to be borrowed in advance from barons, clergy, and burgesses.[1]

Of the Council which met in the September following we have no record; but it was probably in consequence of arrangements then made that in the rolls of 1366–7 and 1369–8 the customs of the second half of the year, which were considered about sufficient to yield the required £4000, were still, as in 1365–6, separately paid to the Chamberlain.[2] The accounts also show us that the contribution during the two succeeding years went mainly to the personal expenses of the King, the receipts from it being, largely at the audit of 1366–7 and wholly at that of 1367–8, paid to the Clerk of Liverance.[3]

With all the efforts that were being made to extricate Scotland from her difficulties, her financial embarrassments were increasing. Two termly payments of the ransom had been made under the new treaty, and the funds had been found for making the third; but the contribution was levied under difficulties: its collection was opposed and resisted, not in the half-rebellious districts only, but in the settled Lowlands. We read of the collectors being deforced by Robert Bruce at Clackmannan[1] and by Sir Alexander of Lindsay, the justiciary, and Andrew of Lesley, in the Mearns.[2] The King's expenditure had greatly increased since his second marriage, and he had borrowed large sums from burgesses, in England as well as in Scotland. Then the embassies to England were an increasing drain on the country's resources; and it is evident, from the anxiety of the Government for an extension of the truce, that an outbreak of war was considered imminent.

[1] The burdens were divided among these orders in the proportion of ten, six, and four, an arrangement which may be taken as indicative of what was then considered an equitable distribution of a general impost among the three Estates of the realm.

[2] It was perhaps also in pursuance of an ordinance of this Council that what wool of the previous year was uncustomed before Candlemas was made to pay quadruple instead of triple custom (p. 251).

The Parliament which met at Scone on 27th September 1367, with the view of providing an income for the King, decreed a more sweeping revocation than that of 1357 of alienations of the Crown lands and Crown property of every kind,[3] an enactment which, wherever it was possible to carry it out, was attended with much serious injustice. In connection with this measure, a list has been preserved of alienated rents, wards, and other casualties with which the sheriffs had not ventured to interfere, and regarding which reference was made to the Council to be held in February following,[4] a document the more valuable from the loss of the corresponding sheriffs' accounts. Another enactment of the same Parliament was to the effect that the whole triple custom should be applied in payment of the ransom: and as one-third part of it—namely, the single custom—was Crown property, the King and Council were empowered to levy a contribution to that extent as soon as the amount should be known, namely, after the next audit.[1]

Practical considerations led the next Parliament, which met in June 1368, to substitute for this project of an additional contribution a simpler scheme—the raising of the customs from triple to quadruple of the original rates—the additional rate going to the King's expenses; and from that time forward quadruple instead of triple custom begins to be levied, the rates being two marks on the sack of wool, a mark on the 100 woolfells, and four marks on the last of hides. The custumars' accounts for 1369 are wanting, except that of Aberdeen, then in the hands of Queen Margaret,[2] and in it the custom is quadruple, the fourth penny being handed over to the King's Chamberlain. In after years, however, the reservation of a fourth for the King's personal expenses was given up, and the balance of the custumars' accounts was paid to the Chamberlain, in defrayment alike of the expenses of the King and of the nation.

In the proceedings of the Parliaments of June

[1] In the proceedings of this Parliament, as printed from the "Black Book," there are, both in Robertson's Parliamentary Records and in the Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, a few misprints that make the meaning obscure. In the latter, vol. i. p. 502b, line 12, "negata que" should be two words, not one. In line 37, "nonam" should be "novam."

1368 and March 1368–9, while the rebellious state of the Highlands and islands was the most prominent topic, the prolongation of the truce, now drawing to a close, was also matter of grave concern; and at the latter of the two a contribution of threepence in the pound was appointed for the expenses of Sir Robert Erskine and Wardlaw, now Bishop of Glasgow, who had been despatched to Edward's court with fresh instructions,[1] a tax of which we have a separate account in the audit of 1369–70,[2] and by which £445, 10s. 6d. was realised.[3]

But affairs had in the meantime taken a new turn in England. The rupture of the peace of Bretigny by Charles v. had suddenly plunged Edward into a war with France, for which he had to concentrate his energies; and he was therefore glad to come to terms with Scotland. The accounts tell us of the arrival in the course of 1369 of French envoys, who were kept sixteen weeks in Scotland at a cost of £66, 13s. 4d., in consequence of David's absence at the English Court.[4] Edward caused a prolongation of the truce with Scotland for fourteen years to be published on the 18th June;[5] and by a treaty ratified at Edinburgh on 20th July and Westminster on 24th August,[1] 56,000 marks were recognised as the balance due, which the Scots bound themselves to pay by yearly instalments of 4000 marks at Candlemas, a term afterwards changed to St John's Day,[2] all further claims under the treaty of 1365 being cancelled. Edward at the same time allowed the Scots half the rent of the lands subject to him in the sheriffdom of Roxburgh.

[5] Fœdera, iii. p. 873. In the Chamberlain's account rendered in January 1369–70 occurs the entry: "Et in expensis Alexandri de Cokburn et Johannis Gray, transeuncium versus Berwycum pro literis treugarum portandis et communicandis, xiij s. iiij d." (pp. 347, 348).

Later in the same year David made a successful expedition against the northern rebels, John of the Isles tendering his submission at Inverness, and engaging to put down all who resisted the royal authority in tax-collecting or otherwise.[3]

In the Chamberlain's account of January 1369–70 we find the King paying his creditors under deduction of a third penny, that is, at a composition of 13s. 4d. in the pound. The whole amount paid with this deduction was £747, 2s. 11d.; and included not only furnishings for the royal household and wardrobe in 1366 and 1367, but money borrowed for the provisioning of Edinburgh Castle.[4]

The next Parliament, which met at Perth in February 1369–70, cancelled all debts contracted by the King prior to Epiphany 1368, it being ordered that for the future all debts should be promptly paid, and the King being enjoined to live within his means.[1]

Of David's last Parliament, which met in October 1370, no records have been preserved except a charter to the Earl of Ross.[2] The rolls, however, show that it had imposed a general contribution of a shilling in the pound, which four months later, at the audit of 15th February 1370–71, yielded above £4000.[3]

Of this audit, held a few days before David's death, only the Chamberlain's account has been preserved.[4] On the charge side the two principal items are the receipts from the customs, which yielded £9521, 2s. 8½d., and the contribution alluded to. The proceeds of taxes of 3s. 4d. per pound on the exportation of money, and the same on the exportation of horses, imposed in February 1369–70, were insignificant. There is a return of £40, 19s. 8d. from the Earldom of Moray then in the hands of the Crown,[5] it being explained that the

[5] On the death without issue of the two sons of Bruce's distinguished nephew, successively Earls of Moray, who perished, the one at Dupplin and the other at Durham, their sister Agnes and her husband Patrick Earl of March kept possession of the earldom, though the limitation in King Robert's charter was to heirs male of the body. The late Mr Alexander Sinclair, in explaining this matter in a valuable privately printed pamphlet on the earldom of March, assumed that Robert II., wishing to secure a fortune for his daughter Marjory, availed himself of the flaw in the title to transfer the earldom from the elder to the younger son of the heroic Agnes. It was, however, in David's reign, not Robert's, that the flaw was both discovered and taken advantage of. In the return of Crown property in the hands of remainder of the rents were reserved for the King's future expenses.[1] The Chamberlain's whole receipts were £15,349, 14s. 9½d.; out of which £2666, 13s. 4d. were reserved for the ransom money, no less than £4148, 18s. went to defray the expense of envoys to England, France, and the Papal Court, and £966 was paid for one of David's journeys to England. A third of the issues of the justice-ayre within the earldom of Moray was paid to the Countess of Moray, that is Euphemia Ross, wife of the Steward and afterwards Queen, whose first husband was John third Earl of Moray.[2]

At David's death there remained due to the King of England an unpaid balance of ransom money, exclusive of what was provided for in the above account, of 48,000 marks.

subjects made in pursuance of the Parliamentary revocation of 1367, are included the rents of the earldom of Moray in the hands of the Earl of March (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 528, 529); and the rolls show us that after Martinmas 1368 these rents were paid to the Chamberlain (pp. 343, 352, 363). The motive of the resumption was, therefore, not the aggrandisement of the family of Robert, who was then Steward, but the replenishment of David's exchequer.

[2] Page 360. In one of the previous burgh rolls the Countess of Moray got her terce from the customs of Inverness and Elgin (pp. 186, 197), the whole of which had been enjoyed under the charter of the earldom by Thomas Randolph and his two sons. The Earl and Countess of March, though undisturbed in their possession of the Earldom of Moray, seem not to have been allowed to retain the customs conveyed along with it. No doubt in the Inverness account of 1359 (vol. i. p. 611) it is only the additional custom imposed that year that appears; but in subsequent rolls the custumars debit themselves with the whole triple custom of these burghs.

IV.

A week after the Exchequer audit last alluded to, on 22d February 1370–1, David II. died in Edinburgh Castle; and under the settlement of 1318 the Crown devolved on his nephew the Steward.

During the greater part of David's reign, William first Earl of Douglas, the nephew and representative of Bruce's gallant companion in arms, had been one of the chief supports of the national cause, with which he was indeed hardly less identified than the Steward himself. Nevertheless Wyntoun relates that immediately on Robert's accession, he, for some unexplained cause, brought an armed force to Linlithgow, and that mischief might have ensued, but for the intervention of Sir Robert Erskine and the Earls of March and Moray, who pacified him by contriving the marriage that soon afterwards took place between his son and the King's daughter.[1] These particulars, related by a nearly contemporary writer, can hardly have been destitute of all foundation in fact; but they assume an entirely new shape in the hands of Bower and of Hume of Godscroft. Fordun's continuator asserted that when the estates met to elect a King at Linlithgow, Douglas claimed the crown for himself, and that in virtue of a descent from the Comyns and Balliols;[2] and the historian of the house of Douglas and

[1] Wyntoun, l. vi. c. i.

Angus explained more circumstantially that the claim came through his mother Dornagilla, daughter of the Red Comyn, and niece of John Balliol.[1] But the universal recognition by the nation of the settlement of 1318 in favour of the Steward makes Bower's statement incredible that the Parliament met at Linlithgow to deliberate on appointing a successor to David. Then the supposed genealogy rests on a fiction long ago exploded by Ruddiman, though again and again resuscitated. Douglas' mother, instead of being a Comyn, was Beatrix, daughter of Sir Alexander Lindsay of Crawfurd, and, after the death of Archibald Douglas, wife of Sir Robert Erskine, who is supposed to have effected the reconciliation.[2] Any claim of Balliol representation that could have come through the Comyns then rested in the Earl of Athole, who was great grandson and heir to the Red Comyn, and was alive when Robert II. succeeded to the throne.

But whatever was the nature or cause of the misunderstanding between Robert II. and the Earl

[1] Hume's "House of Douglas and Angus," i. p. 99.

[2] In evidence of this we have: 1. Wyntoun's statement (l. viii. c. 41) that Sir David Lindsay of Crawfurd was "eme" (uncle) of Douglas. 2. A charter of the barony of West Calder in the Torphichen charter chest, "domine Beatrici de Douglas, sponse quondam Archibaldi de Douglas" in life-rent, and her son and heir John of Douglas in fee, undated, but confirmed by David II. in 1356 (Riddell's Tracts Legal and Historical, pp. 216, 223). 3. The existence in the repositories of the Earls of Mar (as mentioned in the "Lives of the Lindsays," i. p. 54) of a charter granted to Archibald of Douglas and his lawful heirs of the lands of Retterief and others. These lands were the terce of Beatrix Lindsay or Douglas, which fell under the jus mariti of her second husband Sir Robert Erskine, reverting to the Douglases after her death; and it was thus that the document found its way into the Mar charter chest.

of Douglas, it was so transient that we seek in vain for any record evidence of it. Alike before and after his accession, Douglas was among Robert's most steady and valued friends.

The coronation of Robert II. by the Bishop of St Andrews was part of the proceedings of the Parliament which assembled at Scone on 26th March 1371: the only allusion to it in the Exchequer rolls is a payment for 32 gallons of wine to be consumed in the kitchen.[1]

At the same Parliament Archibald Douglas "the Grim," natural son of the good Sir James, formerly employed in embassies both to France and to the Pope, and afterwards third Earl of Douglas, was sent to France with three other envoys, who in the course of the same year concluded a treaty with France by which the two countries mutually bound themselves to resist English aggression.[2]

While in this reign we have none of the costly visits to the English Court or other gratuitous sources of expenditure of the preceding one, Robert's own domestic establishment was of necessity an expensive one. By his first wife Elisabeth More he had a family of three grown-up sons and six daughters. His Queen, Euphemia, daughter of the Earl of Ross and widow of John Earl of Moray, had borne him two sons; and he had besides a large number of natural children. The expenses of the King's household formed the subject of consideration at a Council which met on May 3d, 1371,[1] and the accounts give us a glimpse of some of the arrangements then and afterwards come to as to the allowances of the different members of the Royal family.

The Queen, who had her separate Steward of the household,[2] Clerk of Liverance,[3] and Clerk of the Wardrobe,[4] was at first provided with an allowance of £1000 for ornaments;[5] and her other expenses, very moderate for the first two years, exceeded £1000 in 1373, and £1600 in 1374. About 1374 an arrangement was come to by which her annual income, ornaments included, was fixed at 3500 marks, or £2333, 6s. 8d.,[6] allocated on the different burghs—1500 marks from Edinburgh, 400 from Linlithgow, 300 from Haddington, 700 from Aberdeen, 300 from Dundee, and apparently the remaining 300 from Perth, any unpaid balance being supplied by the Chamberlain. In none of the remaining years of her life—she died in 1387—do her receipts from the custumars and Chamberlain together amount to 3500 marks; sometimes, however, there may have been additional payments through the sheriffs which do not appear. But after the troubles with England begin her allowance diminishes. In 1381 she received nothing from the Chamberlain, and only £865, 8s. 2d. from the burghs.

Of the King's sons by his first marriage, the eldest, John, afterwards King Robert III., besides the earldom of Carrick, which the King conferred on him, had the custody of Edinburgh Castle, with a salary of 500 marks.[1] Robert, the second then alive, was Earl of Menteith by marriage, and of Fife by inheritance from the Countess Isobel; and during the portion of Robert's reign included in this volume, he was keeper of Stirling Castle, with a salary of 200 marks.[2] The third was Alexander, Lord of Badenach, famed in after days for his lawless and unruly habits. In the first year of Robert's reign he is mentioned as intromitting with the rents of the Earldom of Moray;[3] in 1373, as entering into possession of the "abthania" of Dull, and refusing to allow the contribution to be levied there;[4] and in 1376 as refusing to pay custom at Inverness on the exportation of his wool.[5]

At the audit of February 1371–2, the earldom of Moray was still in the hands of the Crown;[6] a month later it was bestowed on John Dunbar, the younger son of the late Earl of March (who had married the King's daughter, Marjory), Lochaber, Badenach, the Castle of Urquhart, and the great custom of the northern burghs being excluded.[1]

Sir James of Douglas, son of the Earl of Douglas, had, immediately on Robert's accession, an annuity of 100 marks settled on him;[2] £500 were paid him on his marriage to the King's daughter, Margaret;[3] and a further annuity from the fermes of Ednam was made up to the sum of £100 by the Chamberlain, in consequence of the lands from which it was payable being partially occupied by the English.[4] The Earl himself was made Justiciary of Scotland south of the Forth.[5]

Sir Robert Erskine, if superseded in the custody of Stirling Castle, was rewarded for his many public services with a gift of 500 marks[6] and an annuity of £100 from the fermes of Aberdeen.[7] On his son Thomas, who had preceded the Earl of Carrick in the office of Keeper of Edinburgh Castle,[8] were conferred the sheriffship of Edinburgh,[9] and the valuable ward and marriage of the daughter and heir of Sir David of Barclay, Lord of Brechin,[10] who became the wife of Walter Earl of Athole, the King's son by his second marriage. Alan, younger son of Sir Robert Erskine, was made Sheriff of Fife.[11]

alliance of France than that of England, he was, nevertheless, alive to the importance of keeping on good terms with England. The instalments yet due of the deceased King's ransom were paid with considerable regularity, notwithstanding that a famine overspread the country for two years, during which large importations of corn had to be made from England.[1] A contribution of 1s. in the pound had to be levied in 1373; we have a separate account of it as collected in the sheriffdoms.[2] In the Chamberlain's account of February 1373–4, the receipts in respect of it from the sheriffdoms were £1681, 18s. 10d., from the burghs £739, 8s. 1d., and from the clergy £166, 9s. 5d.;[3] and in the account of the succeeding year there are entered additional receipts, probably arrears, to the amount of £180, 16s. 8d.[4] The concluding instalment of the ransom was paid, and a discharge in full obtained, on December 1st 1383, two months before the termination of the fourteen years' truce.[5]

The truce was throughout but ill observed. Soon after Robert's accession, the Earl of March, in retaliation for the slaughter of a kinsman or vassal, captured and burned Roxburgh, then under English rule, and put its inhabitants to the sword, an achievement that was prelude to a series of mutual raids and forays, in one of which Berwick Castle was temporarily recovered. In addition to the wardens, the English employed commissioners to examine into the disputes which led to these outbreaks; and both they and the wardens were enjoined to do what they could to enforce observance of the truce,[1] but at the same time to have their men armed and ready.[2] Bower tells us that the eldest and second sons of the King were commissioned to hold courts —"dies marchiarum"—for a similar purpose;[3] and notices occur of days of the marches held in 1373 by the Earl of Fife at Melrose;[4] in 1377 by the Earl of Carrick at Melrose,[5] the expenses of which were £100, besides £18 for wine, and 31s. for lampreys; and in 1378 by the Earl of Fife at Ayton.[6] In 1379 there are traces of two separate days of the marches, one at Coldingham, for whose expenses £60 were paid to the Earl of Fife;[7] the other held by the Earl of Carrick at Melrose.[8]

Robert, according to the "Liber Pluscardensis,"[9] was much addicted to hunting and hawking; and the rolls tell us again and again of hunting parties held by him at Kindrocht,[10] known in modern times as the Castle of Braemar. Frequent mention of provisions sent to Bute show that he must have often resided in that island, which he had possessed when Steward of Scotland.[11]

V.

The rolls of the custumars and bailies of the burghs contained in the present volume call for a few separate remarks. Berwick, the most important burgh in the rolls of the close of Robert's and beginning of David's reign, has ceased to render any accounts, having passed into the hands of the English. Roxburgh is in the same position. We have no longer accounts of the fermes of Kirkcudbright, Wigtown, or the small northern burghs of Cullen, Kintore, and Fyvie. Aberdeen and Edinburgh had had feu-charters from Robert Bruce at a reddendo of £213, 6s. 8d. and £34, 13s. 2d. respectively; and to the number of burghs in a similar position are added in the course of the period of this volume Dundee,[1] which paid £20; Inverness,[2] £53, 6s. 8d.; Montrose,[3] £16; and Perth,[4] £80—the rent in each case exceeding that paid under the immediately preceding lease of the Chamberlain.

Comparing the burgh fermes of 1378 with those of the close of Robert Bruce's reign, the most marked falling off is found in Perth. The £80 feu-duty under the charter of 1375, though far in excess of what had been paid for many years previously, is only half of the rent paid in 1327. Ayr, Crail, Dumbarton, Forfar, and Inverkeithing pay

[2] Page 495.
[3] Page 491.

less, and Inverness, Montrose, Dumfries, Lanark, and Banff more than formerly.

Since the trebling and quadrupling of the customs, the accounts of the custumars have become far more important than those of the bailies, and occupy the face instead of as formerly the dorse of the rolls. In order to impose a check on fraud or evasion regarding the weight of wool customed, the Parliament of March 1363–4 provided that a competent person should attend at the weighing-house of each burgh on the part of the Crown ;[1] and the Council which met in December following ordered that a tron for weighing wool should be established in every burgh of export, with a tronar, whose fee was to be 1d. on each sack.[2]

From this time forward the discharge side of the customs' accounts contains, in addition to the custumars' fee of 4d. on every pound of custom, that of the tronar, namely, 1d. on every sack of wool weighed, the proper weight of each sack being 24 stones. There are also from time to time entries for repairs for the tron, or sometimes more specifically for ropes and weights, or wood for a great beam for the tron.

Under the former tariff various exemptions from great custom had existed in favour of churchmen. The Abbot of Dunfermline, in virtue of a charter of David I., enjoyed freedom from custom for his ship.[3]

By a charter of David II. of date 13th March 1351–2, the customs of the burgh and regality of Arbroath were granted or confirmed to the abbey of Arbroath ;[1] and the customs of the burgh of St Andrews belonged to the Bishop of St Andrews. It is not clear that the monks of Melrose had any similar exemption as matter of right.

When the rate of customs was doubled, trebled, and finally quadrupled, these exemptions, generally speaking, were not construed to extend to the additional duty. From the date when the triple custom begins, each burgh roll contains an account of the custumars of St Andrews, in which, while the full triple or quadruple custom appears on the charge side, the old half-mark rate is entered on the discharge side as paid to the bishop. There is an account of the double, that is, the additional, custom of Arbroath in the burgh roll of 1359 ;[2] and though no customs accounts from Arbroath appear in the present volume, the charter granted by Robert III. to the Abbot of Arbroath in 1392 confirms his right of exemption only to the extent of one-fourth of the then existing custom, that is, the half mark on every sack of wool, and the corresponding duty on fells and hides.[3] In the Edinburgh accounts in the first part of this volume we find the monks of Melrose habitually allowed to ship wool at a mark a sack during the subsistence of the triple, and a pound a sack under the quadruple, tariff.[1] But in the first Edinburgh account under Robert II. this is said to be "propter remissionem sibi factam ex concessione regis David nondum revocate, super quo consulendus est rex;"[2] and the following year, when the privilege is continued, it is said to be "de gracia regis."[3]

Considerable purchases of English wool were made by merchants of Edinburgh and Haddington —sometimes also of Linlithgow and North Berwick —and we find it allowed to be customed at either a mark or half a mark per sack "ex licencia regis,"[4] equally before and after the change from the triple to the quadruple tariff.

Under the quadrupled tariff the customs occasionally exceeded £10,000. In the concluding year of this volume they amounted to £7640, of which sum £600 was derived from hides, and the rest from wools and woolfells.

While over the whole of Scotland the produce of the custom of wool was about thirteen times that of the custom of hides, the variation of this ratio in the different burghs of export, as brought together in the following table, made up from the accounts of 1378, will enable us to distinguish what were the cattle-rearing and what the sheep-rearing

The customs' accounts also enable us to form some approximative idea of the number of sheep in the country. Taking as before the audit of 1378-9 —one below and not above the average—the customs are there accounted for (exclusive of English wool) of 5112 sacks wool and 42,226 woolfells.[1] From the custom being the same on a sack of wool as on 200 (that is, 240) woolfells, and from the enactment of 1357 authorising the King to make purchases of wool having fixed the same price (four marks) for the sack of wool and the 200 woolfells, we may conclude that the 240 woolfells contained about the same weight of wool as the sack, namely, 24 stones or 360 lbs.[1] As the fell must contain somewhat more wool than the shorn fleece, the sack must have contained the fleeces of above 240—say 280—sheep, the clip of wool being thus a little less than $1\frac{1}{4}$ lb. per sheep.

Taking 280 fleeces in the sack as the basis of computation, there were exported in 1378, 1,431,360 shorn fleeces, and 42,226 woolfells; in all, 1,473,586 fleeces. As the woollen dress of the lower orders was of home manufacture, there must have been a considerable quantity of wool retained in the country. Keeping this in view, and also the probability that some of the fleeces exported by the religious houses were not accounted for, the conclusion seems warranted that the number of sheep in the country exceeded a million and a half—being more than half of the number reared in 1814, when the population of Scotland was certainly more than twice as large.[2]

The number of hides of cattle exported in 1378 was 44,559; but we have no materials for estimating what proportion these bore to the whole stock reared in the country.

[1] The stone of wool, according to the "Assisa Regis de David de mensuris et ponderibus," was equivalent to 15 pounds.—Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. p. 673.

It is impossible, with the data which the accounts afford us, to maintain that the wars of David's minority abridged the material resources of Scotland to the extent that is generally believed. In the customs' accounts of 1327 we find 5065 stones of wool and 42,285 woolfells exported, or in all the fleeces of 1,450,485 sheep, and 8861 hides, rather fewer head of sheep and only one-fifth of the number of hides of cattle, the exports including at the same time those of a large district of country which in 1378 was under English rule. On the other hand, some allowance is to be made for the exports of Inverness and St Andrews, which are not included in the roll of 1327; and it may be that the return is in other respects less complete than that of 1379.

Comparing further the customs' accounts of 1327 and 1379 we find, as might be expected, that the exports of those ports which have come in place of Berwick, namely, Haddington, Dunbar, and North Berwick, fall greatly short of those of Berwick, the produce of much of the country around Berwick being of course still shipped there. The exports of Edinburgh and Aberdeen in wools and woolfells, and still more in hides, are materially greater in 1378 than in 1327. Montrose, whose trade was insignificant in 1327, had become a considerable port; and the export trade of Linlithgow was twelve times what it had been in wool, and had increased still more in hides. Dundee and Perth exported less wool than in 1327; but the number of hides shipped from Dundee had doubled, and from Perth quadrupled.

Though "rotuli tangentes compota monetariorum" are enumerated among the documents carried from Scotland by Edward I. in 1292,[1] the accounts of the Mint in this volume and in the close of the preceding one are the oldest records now extant connected with the coinage of Scotland.

David during his captivity seems to have given some attention to the institutions of England, and profited by their study. What knowledge he had acquired of the English Mint he turned to account in remodelling that of his own country. Artistically his coins are a great advance on those of his predecessors.[2] Following the example of England,[3] he introduced Italians—then the best workers in the precious metals—into the management of the

[1] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. p. 114.

[2] David is accredited in the popular tradition of England not only with taking an interest in art, but with having himself handled the chisel. Speed, in his "Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain," p. 65 (1611), describes a vault under the Castle of Nottingham as remarkable in his day "for the story of Christ his passion engraven on the walls and cut by the hand of David the second King of Scots whilst he was therein detained prisoner."

Mint. Prior to 1357 the principal officer connected with the coin had been the moneyer (monetarius), who moved with the court from place to place, coining money whenever it was required. David introduced as the head of the Mint a new officer called the keeper of the money (custos monete), a post which he conferred on Adam Tore, one of the most considerable citizens of Edinburgh, and one of the three burgesses of that place whom the burghs of Scotland collectively empowered to negotiate for the King's ransom.[1] Under him, discharging the function of master moneyer, was James Mulekyn of Florence, called in the rolls "magister Jacobus," the respective duties of these officers being probably much what they were thirty-four years afterwards defined to be in an ordinance in Council.[2] The keeper was responsible for the weight and standard of the money, received the bullion brought to the Mint, and entered its weight in the register; and the master moneyer delivered to him every evening the money that had been coined during the day, and after it had accumulated for a week had its quality tested. Tore must have been appointed as early as February 1357–8, as his account rendered in 1358–9 runs from that date;[3] but on 1st July 1358 Tore and Mulekyn had charters or letters-patent conferring on them certain privileges connected with the coin.[4]

From Tore's account of 1358–9 it appears that during the year comprised in it £3711, 16s. 11d. had been coined in Edinburgh, most of it probably in esterlings or silver pennies, on which the King's seignorage of 7d. in the pound amounted to £108, 5s. 2d.[1] Moneyers and "operarii" are referred to in this account, also John of Cologne, the "impressor" of the coins. There is a payment of £2, 10s. 2d. for instruments for stamping the coin. As yet no permanent building was set apart for the Mint; and the house of John of Corry was hired at the rent of £5 yearly for carrying on the process of coining. Payments occur for repairing the houses of the moneyers.

We have two later accounts of Tore, one rendered in June 1361,[2] the other in December 1364.[3] In the former the King's receipts from the seignorage of 7d. are £145, showing that in the fifteen months embraced in it £4971, 8s. 7d. had been coined. In the latter, which includes three years and a half, the King's receipts are £570, 10s. 2d., the seignorage being still 7d., except during the last month, when officers of the Mint (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. vii. p. 227).

[1] Either at this time or subsequently during David's rêign, a few nobles were coined, gold pieces of extreme beauty and rarity, a free imitation of the well-known nobles of Edward III. On the obverse is the King in a ship with a sword in his right hand and a shield bearing the arms of Scotland in his left; on the reverse a very ornate cross, with a lion under a crown in each of the angles. It seems doubtful whether these pieces were ever in general circulation. On the credit side of Tore's account is an entry of 40s. for five nobles of gold (whose value ought to have been 33s. 4d.) delivered to the King by James the moneyer.

it was raised to 8d. £30 are paid in the account of 1361 to the sculptors of the moneyers' instruments, and £3 for steel and iron for making the instruments. The master moneyer must still have been "magister Jacobus." In the account of 1364, in addition to his name there occurs that of Bonagius, also a Florentine, his successor, who is paid "pro tabulis de diversis ymaginibus et aliis diversis rebus sculptis et depictis, receptis ad opus regis.

In 1373 there was a mint at Perth as well as at Edinburgh, Thomas of Strathern being "custos monete" at the one and Andrew the painter at the other. The Chamberlain's account for 1373 shows that the King's seignorage for a year at Perth was £174, 13s. 8d.; at Edinburgh, £28, 5s. 4d.;[1] and further receipts from both Mints occur in 1374.[2]

Tore's accounts give us no information regarding the money standard at that date. It is satisfactorily shown by Mr Cochrane Patrick, to whose excellent introduction to his "Records of the Coinage of Scotland," the editor here acknowledges his obligations, that the common belief regarding the extent to which the currency was depreciated in the reigns of David II. and Robert II. is erroneous and exaggerated. Ruddiman was led into error in this matter by overlooking the difference between the English and the Scotch pound weight of silver. The original standard of weight of the money of Scotland was not the pound of twelve ounces, twenty shillings, or 240 esterlings, but the pound of fifteen ounces, twenty-five shillings, or 300 esterlings. "The pund in King Davidis dayis," says the "Assisa David I. de mensuris et ponderibus," a capitular belonging to the time of Robert Bruce,[1] "weyit xxv schillingis. Now the pund aw to way in silver xxvj schillingis and iij sterling penijs, and that for the mynoratioun of the peny that is in the tym now. Item the pund sould wey xv uncis." The currency had therefore by the time of Robert Bruce been so far deteriorated that the pound weight of silver was coined into 26s. 3d. instead of 25s.

There had meanwhile been a deterioration of the English money to about the same extent, and in the days of Robert I. the money of Scotland passed in England for its full value. In 1354 Edward III. had so far depreciated the English currency as to coin 270 instead of 240 pennies from the pound of silver. The Steward, as regent during David's captivity, adopted a similar measure in Scotland, but went further than Edward; and the result was a royal proclamation of date 1355, that the new money of Scotland, though of the same appearance as the old, not being, like it, equal in weight and alloy to the money of England, should only be received as bullion, the old money, however, continuing to be current.[2] In the first treaty regarding David's ransom (3d October 1357) it is provided that the ransom is to be paid in esterlings or other money of the King of England, or other gold and silver money at the value that it brings.

The first coinage after the remodelling of the Mint under Adam Tore seems to have been somewhat better than the coinage complained of, and nearly, if not quite, up to the English standard. Such, at least, must have been the case if the English annalist Knighton's assertion[1] is to be relied on, that David on visiting England in 1358 petitioned Edward that the money of the two countries should be interchangeably current, and that his request was granted. That the coinages to which Tore's second and third accounts relate had fallen short of the same standard may perhaps be surmised from the terms of the second treaty regarding the ransom (20th June 1361), in which it was again stipulated that payment should be made in money of England or other gold money of its value; but its inferiority appears more clearly from the proceedings of the Council which met at Holyrood on 8th May 1366. It was there determined that the money to be coined in future should be of like weight and purity with that made by "magister Jacobus," so as to come up to the standard of England, and that it should bear a "signum notabile" to distinguish it from previous coinages; and it was further resolved that the subject should be maturely advised in the next Parliament.[1]

In what have been preserved of the proceedings of the Parliament that met in July 1366 no allusion exists to the coinage; but in the succeeding Parliament, which assembled in September 1367, the subject was brought under consideration. This appears, not from the extant records of the Parliament itself, but from an order by the King, of date 7th October following,[2] to the "custos monete" and "monetarius," from which it appears that that assembly, viewing the question somewhat differently from the Council, had resolved that the money, while coming up to the English standard as to purity, should be diminished in weight by ten pennies in the pound; or that 29s. 4d. should be coined out of the pound weight of silver, of which the King should have a seignory of sevenpence, one penny should go to the "custos monete," and elevenpence to the master moneyer and his workmen, leaving 27s. 9d. for the merchant,[3] a deterioration which—keeping in view that 26s. 3d. had been the yield of the pound weight of silver in the reign of Robert Bruce—was far from considerable, although it led to another proclamation in England that no Scotch money should be received but as bullion.[4]

[2] Ibid. p. 502.

[4] Fœdera, iii. p. 838.

The payments of the ransom money in the accounts of the Chamberlain are always said to be made in gold, the standard English gold coin being then the noble, worth 6s. 8d. In connection with the gold payments, mention is made again and again of "defalcacio argenti;[1] and this loss is particularized in Mercer's account[2] as fivepence in the pound.

The deterioration went on under Robert II. That the coinage of which these records speak under Thomas of Strathern and Andrew the painter must have been inferior in weight and purity to that of 1367, sufficiently appears from two English proclamations of 1373 and 1374, by which fourpence of Scots money were ordered to be received as equivalent to threepence English.[3]

During the reign of David II., and for a few years after his death, it may be said generally that there was no such debasement of the coinage as would very visibly affect the prices of the necessaries of life. With a considerable fluctuation in the price both of live stock and of grain, the tendency was on the whole towards a fall in the price of cattle, sheep, and oats, and a rise in that of wheat. We find the price of a mart stated as 9s. in 1329,[4] 8s. 7d. in 1330,[5] 7s. in 1331,[6] 6s. 8d. in 1367,[7] and 4s. 11d. in 1372.[8] Sheep are purchased not below the average price of wine. The Greek wine called "garnache"[1] is occasionally named; but, judging from its price, it cannot have been in very high esteem.[2]

Of malt there is frequent mention, and of the ale brewed from it (cerevisia venalis). The account of the Clerk of Liverance of Queen Euphemia, rendered in February 1374–5, indicates a consumption of 3315 gallons for her household in the space of thirty-three weeks.[3] Beer, so called in contradistinction from ale, seems to have been an importation from Germany; it is on one occasion called "cerevisia de Alemania sive bere."[4]

We have frequent mention of horses bought for David II., whose prices varied from £2, 13s. 4d.[5] to £20.[6]

VII.

It has been already seen that with all the manifold evils that the wars of the "disinherited barons" had inflicted on Scotland, her material resources were not exhausted. The burgesses of the towns, the class on whom directly fell the increased customs which were the real source out of which the ransom was paid, had notably flourished under the new commercial relations with England.

Nor had culture and the arts altogether taken leave of the country. That the schools of earlier times, of whose existence there was abundant charter evidence, lived through the War of Succession is attested by Robert Bruce's payments for the maintenance of various persons carrying on their studies at them ;[1] and after David's return from captivity they continue to be referred to from time to time in the records. The custumar of Cupar Fife in 1359, presumably one of the leading burgesses of that place, is designed master of the schools there,[2] this same "Nicholas rector scolarum de Cupar" being one of the burgesses who, two years previously, received power from the burghs collectively to negotiate for the ransom of the sovereign.[3] In the Chamberlain's account of 1364, £4 are paid by warrant of David for the maintenance and clothing "unius pauperis scholaris, consanguinei domini regis."[4] The youth of the higher classes were not slow to avail themselves of the leave readily granted them by Edward to study at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge,[5] and even Scotchmen of undistinguished birth and mature age occasionally took the opportunity of obtaining at the English universities a higher education than was procurable in their own country.

One of the last-named class was John Barbour, the metrical biographer of Bruce, whose language and versification may compare with those of the best English contemporary poets, Chaucer included. He was Archdeacon of Aberdeen as early as 1357, and the safe-conducts granted him[1] show that it was after he had held this position for years that he resorted to the universities of England and of France for the purpose of study. His name occurs frequently in this volume, and also in the later rolls of Robert II. and those of Robert III. In 1372, three years before what he tells us was the date of the completion of his "Bruce,"[2] he is found discharging the dignified and important function of an auditor of Exchequer,[3] and soon after we find him clerk of audit.[4] In 1377, in consideration probably of his poem, he had a gratuity of £10 from Robert II.,[5] and a year or two later he obtained by charter to himself and his assigns an annuity of twenty shillings out of the fermes of Aberdeen.[6] Besides "The Bruce," he wrote another national epic, now lost, having for its subject the history of the house of Stewart; and it was perhaps in acknowledgment of this second work that he had in 1388 the further grant of £10 yearly from the customs of Aberdeen.[7] The name of this poem, "The Brute," preserved to us by Wyntoun, shows that it

The power of assignation was exercised by him in favour of the Cathedral of Aberdeen for the celebration of his anniversary, and the Dean and chapter received the annuity after his death. was founded on the fable connecting the royal races of Britain with Brutus, Prince of Troy. According to the rhyming chronicler,[1]

Bower, however, accuses Barbour of misrepresenting the origin of the Stewarts ;[2] and there seems strong reason to suspect him of having originated the long accepted story of their descent from the Scottish king Ethus through the fabulous Banquo and his son Fleance. The true pedigree of the family and their relationship to the English Fitz Alans was perfectly well known in Barbour's time ;[3] but the Archdeacon was too much of a courtier to assign to his sovereign a common descent with any English family.

Contemporary with Barbour was the historian John of Fordun, whose valuable Chronicle and Annals must still form the basis of every history of Scotland in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

In Scotland as in England the fourteenth was on the whole the greatest church-building century ; and if there was a pause during the troubled time that succeeded Robert Bruce's death, it seems to have been in the years that followed David's return from captivity that the nave of Glasgow, the tower of Brechin, and portions of Melrose, Kelso, and Pluscardine Abbeys were built. Generally speaking, it is only in connection with such incidents as a gift to the Minorite Friars of Haddington towards the fabric of their church[1] that there is any allusion in the rolls to the church building of the time. One exception, however, there is in the church of St Monans in Fife, which was built and endowed by David II., and regarding which we have some interesting particulars.

[3] In 1336, as shown by Chalmers, Edward III. purchased the stewardship of Scotland from Robert Earl of Arundel, while Edward Balliol as King of Scotland ratified the transaction, the sale being a political fiction, founded on the supposed forfeiture of the Scottish branch of the family by which the hereditary office reverted to the English line (Chalmers' Caledonia, i. p. 574).

St Monan is understood to have been one of a company of Hungarian missionaries to the Picts in the end of the eighth century, who suffered martyrdom at the hands of the Danes in the island of May. His remains were brought to Inverey on the mainland, which had been one of the scenes of his labours, and a little chapel which was erected over them acquired a reputation for its cures. According to Bower,[2] David was wounded at the battle of Durham with an arrow. The barb remained in the wound, the skill of the leeches of the day being unavailing to extract it; and it remained unremoved till the King made a pilgrimage to this shrine, when it miraculously leaped out and the scar closed. If this story be credited, it follows that the arrow had lain festering in the wound for five years and a half, as the King when made prisoner was immediately taken to the Tower of London, and that length of time elapsed before he obtained his first enlargement from captivity.[1] But whatever the moving cause may have been, David, in or before 1362, resolved to replace the humble shrine alluded to with a stately church. Sir William of Dishington, the steward of his household, whose lands of Ardross lay adjacent, was made master of the works, and between 1362 and 1370 sums were paid to Dishington for the fabric of St Monans amounting to £613, 7s.,[2] besides £6, 13s. 4d. for the carpenter work of the church.[3] The ship of John Scot, a burgess of Inverness, was hired by Dishington in 1366 and 1369 to convey timber from that port for the building, at an expense on the one occasion of £20,[4] on the other of £10;[5] and in Scot's account as custumar of that burgh there is a further allowance to him of £7, 17s. 8d. in consideration of the detention of his ship.[6] In the years 1364 and 1366, while the building was in progress, we find payments to at least three chaplains celebrating at St Monans, of whom two had £10 and the third 20 marks yearly.[7] This beautiful church, of which no more than the transept, chancel, and central tower seems ever to have been built, is still one of the most conspicuous and interesting objects on the coast of Fife.

But the principal evidences of building activity which appear in the accounts are connected with Edinburgh Castle. In the uncertain state of the relations with England arising from Edward's refusal to agree to a permanent peace, the garrisoning of the royal castles and putting them in a proper state of defence was the subject of repeated and anxious deliberation in Parliament,[1] and the accounts show large sums expended in repairing and provisioning the principal fortresses. But Edinburgh Castle had in the latter part of David's reign come to be not only one of the great strongholds of Scotland, but the principal residence of royalty; and that king planned and undertook extensive additions to it, which were completed in the succeeding reign. In the Chamberlain's account of 1361 occur payments to Sir John of Preston, Roger Hog,[2] and the Clerk of Liverance, amounting in all to £120, for the construction of the well, and other repairs of the castle.[3] This was the still well-known fountain near the base of the castle rock on the north side; for the spring which had at an earlier period existed within the castle had been choked up during the civil war and lost sight of. It was of essential moment that safe access should be provided to the source of water supply; and a part payment to Roger Hog of £80 for building the "turris fontis"[4] shows that the structure whose ruins are still known as the Wellhouse Tower, as also presumably the passage that formed the communication between it and the castle, of which some remains may yet be traced, were built at this time.[1]

In the Chamberlain's account for 1367, besides sums of £91, 12s. 8d. entered as expended partly for munitions and partly for repairs, and £5, 7s. 4d. for fitting up a sink, vat, and basin (factura plumbi et magne cupe unacum quodam alveo empto),[2] there is a payment of £85, 10s. to William of Guppyld "ad fabricam nove turris de Edynburgh, et ad emendum bordas ad eandem."[3] This is the first mention in the rolls of the principal feature of the buildings erected at this time, a lofty massive tower long known as David's Tower, which occupied a position near the present Halfmoon Battery, and continued to be the most prominent feature of the castle till destroyed in the siege of 1573. From 1367 to 1379 there are regularly-recurring entries in the accounts of the Chamberlain for the fabric of the new tower, sometimes called the Gate Tower.[4] These payments, including outlay for timber and the fee of the master of the work,[5] a thousand boards costing £10 for the roofing of the hall,[6] wages of carpenters and smiths,[7]

[1] The Chamberlain's account of 1381 describes to us how Robert II., on hostilities breaking out with England, set himself to rediscover the ancient well in the castle, and after finding it had it restored and purified at a cost of £95, 0s. 4d. (vol. iii. p. 81).

and £20 for iron for making the iron gate of the castle,[1] amount to £736, 13s. Passing beyond the period included in this volume, in the account of the Edinburgh custumars for 1379 we find a payment to masons for constructing kennels for the King's dogs;[2] in that for 1382 £15, 14s. 8d. are paid for a kitchen built near the great tower, "et aliis domibus necessariis . . ad modum voute factis," besides a further outlay of £5, 13s. 4d. "pro una fabrina et uno fossato juxta castrum."[3] Some idea of the appearance of David's Tower and the adjacent buildings is no doubt conveyed by the representation of them in a bird's-eye view of the castle on a map engraved in 1575, two years after their destruction, which has been reproduced by Dr Daniel Wilson in his "Memorials of Edinburgh in the Olden Time."[4]

In or shortly before 1366 David built a new chapel within the castle dedicated to St Mary, perhaps forming part of the structure connected with the tower which appears in the view of 1575. There was already in the castle an ancient chapel dedicated to St Margaret, which though placed on the highest spot of the castle rock, has survived alike the struggles of the fourteenth century and the sieges that were so fatal to the later buildings. Its architectural details, more especially the zigzag and other mouldings of the chancel arch, point it out to be about coeval with the earliest parts of Holyrood Chapel, which was begun in 1128; and, if not, as Barbour evidently believed it to be, Queen Margaret's oratory,[1] it must have been built in memory of Malcolm's saintly Queen not long after her death. In the account of the bailies of Edinburgh for 1366 there occurs for the first time a payment of £10 to the chaplain in the Chapel of St Mary in the castle "de novo constructa,"[2] an item which recurs yearly in the accounts of either the customs or the fermes of Edinburgh during the remainder of the reign of David II., and continues, though with rather less regularity, in that of Robert II.[3] The last-named King shortly before his death, on 14th February 1390, granted an annual rent of £8 from the customs of Edinburgh to Geoffrey Litster, the chaplain officiating in the Chapel of St Margaret in the castle; and, a few months later, on 3d December 1390, the same grant is confirmed by Robert III.,

[4] Dr Wilson, to whom we owe the rediscovery of the chapel of St Margaret, is not very fortunate in the historical details about the castle given either in the otherwise valuable work alluded to, or in his recently published "Recollections of Old Edinburgh." In his later book he ascribes David's Tower to the first, instead of the second, King of Scots of the name, and identifies the Chapel of St Mary with the church of the castle conveyed in the Charter of Holyrood.

[1] Barbour tells us that the nocturnal capture of the castle by escalade in 1312 by Randolph, with one William Francis for his guide, had been foreseen in vision by the holy Queen, who caused a representation of it to be portrayed on the walls of her chapel, which, with its inscription, was still to be seen in the time of the Archdeacon's contemporaries (The Bruce, c. lxxxiv.).

the services of the chaplain being, however, transferred by him from the Chapel of St Margaret to that of St Mary.[1] From that time forward the salary of £10 is superseded by a payment under this charter of £8 to chaplain Geoffrey, generally described as "formerly celebrating in the Chapel of St Margaret, and now in the newly-erected Chapel of St Mary," though from 1393 to 1396 the payment is made to the chaplain celebrating in the Chapel of St Margaret.

The church of the castle of Edinburgh is mentioned by David I. in his charter of Holyrood, and confirmed to the abbey by Alexander III. and in several Papal bulls. If this church is not with certainty to be identified with the Chapel of St Margaret, it at least cannot have been the building with the crow-stepped gables on the site of the present barracks, represented in Gordon of Rothiemay's view of 1647, and Paul Sandby's of 1750, described in Maitland's "History of Edinburgh" as "a very long and large antient church,"[2] then dismantled, divided into three stories, and occupied as a magazine of ordnance and an armoury. The absence of any building on that site in the view of 1575 shows that the church which Maitland describes must have been erected subsequently to the siege of 1573.

There was at this period no lack in Scotland of skilled artificers in different departments—some of them being, no doubt, foreigners. David's arms for tilting were made in the country,[1] and there is frequent mention of armourers. Nicholas, the mason, is paid for making and sculpturing the tomb of King Robert II.;[2] Andrew, the painter, who succeeded Adam Tore as "custos monete" at Edinburgh,[3] is also paid for his labour expended on the tombs of Robert II. and of his father and mother;[4] there is also mention of John, the painter, of Aberdeen, who was employed to paint armorial banners for David II.;[5] and of Friar Thomas Lorimer, a painter in the time of Robert II.;[6] and there occur in the account of the custumars of Edinburgh for 1832 a payment of £23, 10s., "cuidam pictori fratri pro diversis emptis in Flandria ad opus et de mandato regis," and a further payment to the same Friar painter of 13s. 4d.[7]

The King's silver plate is occasionally mentioned;[8] and there are frequent payments to goldsmiths. Copyn, the goldsmith, who made David's sceptre at his coronation,[9] was probably a foreigner. Nicholas, the goldsmith, in 1364 made jewels for the King, for which he was paid £5 by Adam

Tore.[1] John, the goldsmith, a bailie of Edinburgh,[2] was allowed five nobles of gold to be used in gilding the King's plate;[3] he was also employed in the operations of the Mint, and, in conjunction with Tore, received a penny on each pound of silver coined, besides a fee of one halfpenny on each pound after a certain date, "pro clava."[4] In 1361 he was paid £27, 17s. for making various ornamental articles for the King;[5] in 1364 he was paid by Tore £39, 6s. 8d. for work apparently connected with the Mint;[6] and a payment of £6 to him occurs in the accounts of 1366.[7]

In 1371, £13, 6s. 8d. are paid "aurifabro," the artist not being further identified, for making the Great and Privy Seals of Robert II.[8] Seal engraving on metal was one of the minor arts in which Scotland held at least a respectable position; and the Great and Privy Seals of the Scottish kings from Alexander II. downwards can be compared without disadvantage with those of England. The general design was the same in both countries. On the Great Seal was the King in armour on a caparisoned horse, his arms being shown on a shield and repeated on the caparisons; while the reverse showed the King in royal robes, seated on a chair of state. The Privy Seal bore the royal arms only. The Great Seal of Robert I., which can hardly be supposed to have been executed in England, is distinguished by grace and freedom of design. That of David is very inferior to it; but a Privy Seal of David, made probably after his return from captivity, is extremely beautiful both in idea and execution, a novelty in design being the introduction of two arms issuing from a cloud above, suggestive of Divine protection, encircling the shield.[1] The Great Seal of Robert II. exhibits a very great artistic advance on that of David II.; there is a change of costume in the equestrian figure of the King, in correspondence with the change in the style of armour, and the details of the plate armour, the banded ring-mail, the hauberk, and the jupon are handled with remarkable precision and boldness, and the lettering is beautifully executed. On the counterseal, which is more profusely decorated than in any previous reign, there appears on each side of the throne an embattled buttress, with the shield of Scotland, supported from behind by a creature in human form with feathers and claws.[2] The goldsmith, who was paid twenty marks for making the matrix of this seal, would probably be one of the artificers connected with the remodelled Mint.

[1] The only known impression of this seal is attached to the Melrose charters, formerly in the General Register House, and now in possession of the Duke of Buccleuch. It is engraved in the Chartulary of Melrose, and in Laing's "Catalogue of Scottish Seals."

Some other seals of this period, particularly three of the first Earl of Douglas, are of singular beauty: but, while Scotland contained an artist capable of designing and engraving the Great Seal of Robert II., there seems no reasonable ground for the belief that they were made out of the country. Their entire dissimilarity of character from contemporary French seals is sufficient evidence that they were not made in France.

It remains for the editor to express his thanks to Mr Dickson, Curator of the Historical Department of the General Register House, for many important suggestions; and to Mr Mercer of Gorthy, for calling his attention to several additional sources of information regarding the career of his distinguished ancestors, John and Andrew Mercer. He has also received valuable assistance in transcribing and collating from Mr George Melville.

APPENDIX TO PREFACE.

No. I.

LIST OF CHAMBERLAINS OF SCOTLAND

THE following attempt to supply the desideratum of a chronological list of the holders of the office of Great Chamberlain of Scotland from its first institution to the death of Robert III. is made under difficulties. Almost the only source of information regarding the earlier Chamberlains is the lists of witnesses appended to royal charters, of whom the Chamberlain is often one. But the charters of David I., Malcolm IV., and William the Lion are almost all undated, that is, they bear date the day of the month, without mention of regnal or other year; and it is only through means of such knowledge as we possess from extraneous sources of the periods when some of the remaining witnesses flourished that we can approximate to the actual date. To add to the difficulty, in the monastic chartularies, which are our chief repertory of early charters, the testing clauses are often more or less abridged. If the following list is not quite complete, an endeavour is at least made to avoid the common error of giving a misleading appearance of completeness, by greater precision in dates than the materials warrant.

The existence of the office of Chamberlain cannot be traced further back than the reign of David I. (1124–1153), and of some of its earlier holders, who were churchmen, we only know the Christian name. David, before his accession to the throne, when Earl of Huntingdon and ruler of the country south of Forth and Clyde, had an officer called "Camerarius." "Adam Camerarius" is a witness to his foundation charter of Kelso Abbey of date 1113.

EDMUND, who seems to have been David's earliest Chamberlain as King of Scotland, was witness to the charter to Robert of Bruce of Estrahanent, &c., belonging probably to the earliest years of that King's reign.[1]

HERBERT was Chamberlain in or before 1130; he witnessed a charter by David I. and Matilda, who died in that year.[2] His name occurs in numerous charters by David, and a few by Malcolm IV. With a short intermission, c. 1138–9, he seems to have continued in office till 1160, in which year he witnessed a charter of Malcolm.[3]

PHILIP, c. 1138–9, witness, along with John Bishop of Glasgow, consecrated in 1138, and Gilmichael Earl of Fife, who died in 1139.[4]

NICHOLAS, 1160 or 1161 to 1165. The charters in which his name appears include one[5] by Arnold Bishop of St Andrews, where he is witness along with William Bishop of Moray, "sedis Apostolice legato," a function which that prelate only exercised from his return from Rome in 1160 to his death on 24th January 1161–2;[6] also one by Walter Fitzalan, to which Richard Bishop of St Andrews, who was consecrated in 1165, is a witness.[7] He had the higher office of Chancellor conferred on him in 1165, which he retained till his death in 1170.[1]

Walter of Berkeley, of Inverkeillor and Redcastle, 1165 to 1189, witness to numerous charters during that period.[2] He also witnesses, as Chamberlain, a charter[3] which, unless "R. abbati de Dunfermelin" be a mistake, must have been of as late a date as 1198–9. If the initial letter of the abbot's name be wrongly written or transcribed, as seems probable, the charter may date as early as 1189: the name of Hugh, chancellor, shows that it cannot be earlier. He survived till the beginning of the thirteenth century, and left a daughter and heir, who married Ingelram of Balliol, younger brother of Bernard Balliol, the great-great-grandfather of John Balliol, the vassal king.[4]

[1] Chronicle of Melrose, p. 84. The name of Robert, Chamberlain, appears in two charters of David in the Chartulary of St Andrews (pp. 185–191), whose unauthentic character is established by the occurrence of the name of Cospatrick son of Waldeve, who was born, at the earliest, in the succeeding reign.

[3] Chartulary of Melrose, p. 116.

[4] In a charter of exemption from taxes granted to the Cistercian order, which must bear date 1189, as the witnesses include Richard of Moreville (1162–1189) and Hugh, chancellor (1189-1199), occurs also the name of "Willelmus de Berlai Camerarius," probably a clerical mistake for Walterus (Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ, No. 26).

The name of "Johannes Camerarius" appears twice in the Chartulary of Aberdeen (pp. 7, 9) as witnessing a charter of Malcolm and one of William (the former charter is also in the Chartulary of Moray), but neither charter can possibly be authentic. The one, which bears date the 11th year of Malcolm's reign, i.e., 1163, is granted to Matthew Bishop of Aberdeen, who was elected and consecrated in 1172; the latter is witnessed by Alan the Doorward, justiciary, an anachronism of at least thirty years. The name of "Alanus Ostiarius" occurs in another charter of William in the same collection (p. 8). A critical examination of the earliest portion of the Chartulary of Aberdeen has convinced the editor that it contains a large number of fabricated charters, among which are

Geoffrey of Lempitlaw, c. 1190, witness to a confirmation by Richard of Lincoln and his wife Matilda, daughter and heir of Anselm of Molle, to the monks of Kelso.[1]

Philip de Valoniis, Lord of Panmure, before 1196 to 1215, witness to numerous charters of William the Lion,[2] and to charter of Alexander II. of date 1215.[3] He died 5th November 1215.[4]

William de Valoniis, Lord of Panmure, son of the last, 1215 to 1219.[5] Died 1219.[6] His daughter and heir married Sir Peter Maule, and carried the lands of Panmure to her husband's family.

Henry of Balliol, 1223 or earlier to 1229, perhaps younger son of Ingelram of Balliol and the daughter of Walter of Berkeley, the Chamberlain. Owned lands in Hants, Essex, and Norfolk. Married Lora, sister of the preceding Chamberlain, William de Valoniis. As Chamberlain he is a frequent witness between the years specified.[7]

Sir John of Maccuswell, of Caerlaverock, witness to those which confer on the Bishop the right to second tithes; and it seems to him that the questionable character of these charters was the true reason why, in the face of inquests, confirmations, and warrants, the right continued so long to be called in question, as brought out in Dr Stuart's note, forming appendix No. i. of vol. i. In one of these charters, purporting to be by Malcolm, occurs the name of William, Chamberlain (p. 4).

DAVID OF BERNHAM, a churchman, and brother of Robert of Bernham, burgess of Berwick.[4] As Chamberlain, he witnessed charters on 1st and 24th February 1235–6.[5] He was afterwards Bishop of St Andrews.

HENRY OF BALLIOL again, in or before 1241. His name occurs as witness from 11th January 1241–2[6] to nearly the time of his death,[7] which took place in 1246.[8]

SIR ROBERT OF MEYNERS, 1250 or earlier to 1251. He is supposed to have been appointed on the accession of Alexander III., 8th July 1249, but may have held office at the close of the preceding reign. As Chamberlain he witnessed charters of Alexander III. on 17th February 1250–51,[9] and on 19th August 1251.[10] He died 1266.[11]

WILLIAM EARL OF MAR, 1252 to 1255. As Chamberlain he witnessed charters of Alexander III. on 21st April 1252,[12] 8th June 1252,[13] 12th November 1353,[14] and 17th December 1253.[15] It was the Earl of Mar, and not, as generally asserted, Meyners,[16] who was displaced, when the Government of Scotland was reconstituted under the advice of Henry II. of England in September 1255.

for a period of seven years in September 1255,[1] but displaced at the change of government which took place in 1257, when the young King was kidnapped at Kinross by the party of the Comyns.[2]

AYMERIC OF MACCUSWELL, of Caerlaverock, son of Sir John of Maccuswell, formerly Chamberlain. Appears as Chamberlain March 18th 1257–8 in a treaty[3] by which the nobles of Scotland and Wales came under a mutual obligation not to make peace with England without each other's consent. Was still in office 18th August 1260.[4]

WILLIAM EARL OF MAR again, 1262 or earlier to 1267. As Chamberlain he is witness 14th February 1262–3[5] and 12th February 1266–7;[6] and his account rendered in 1264 is among Lord Haddington's transcripts from the Exchequer rolls.[7]

REGINALD LE CHEN. Appointed 1267.[8] Relinquished office 1269.[9]

William Bullock, a churchman, under Edward Balliol;[1] collected revenues of 1334.[2]

Reginald More again, 1334 to 1340. His accounts include the period from 11th November 1334 to 13th April 1340.[3] He died before 21st May 1340.[4]

William Bullock again. His account begins 22d May 1341, and was rendered 11th June 1342.[5] His downfall and imprisonment in Lochindorb soon followed; and he was dead before 8th August 1343.[6]

John of Roxburgh, a churchman, 1343 to 1346.[7] Fell at the battle of Durham, 17th October 1346.[8]

Sir Robert of Erskine, 1350 or earlier, to 1357.[9]

Thomas Stewart, Earl of Angus, 1357. His account extends from Michaelmas 1357 to 16th March 1357–8.[10]

Thomas Earl of Mar, 1353–9. Numerous payments to him, and by his warrant as Chamberlain, occur in [9] Witness 15th May 1350 to confirmation of West Calder to James Sandilands and Eleanor Bruce. Referred to as Chamberlain in account of bailies of Aberdeen, 8th August 1348 to 14th March 1358–9 (vol. i. pp. 547, 548). Payment by his warrant in account of the Constable of Kinghorn, comprising the four terms following the battle of Durham (i.e., Martinmas 1346, both terms of 1347, and Whitsunday 1348) and the two terms of 1357 (vol. i. p. 565). This payment may belong to 1357, and therefore does not necessarily indicate that Erskine was Chamberlain before 1350; but the editor has found no trace of any one having held the office between Roxburgh, who fell at Durham, and Erskine.

[10] Page 1. Norman of Lesley, though called Chamberlain (vol. i. p. 618), was only deputy of the Earl of Angus.

the accounts applicable to 1358;[1] but his account is wanting.

Walter of Biggar, rector of Errol, 1359 to 1363. His accounts show him to have exercised the office continuously from Martinmas 1358 to 28th March 1362–3;[2] but it would seem that for the first few months he was only deputy chamberlain; and he is so designed as auditor of Exchequer in March 1358–9.[3]

Sir Robert of Erskine again, April 1363 to 11th December 1364.[4]

Walter of Biggar again, from December 1364 to his death in 1376. His accounts go on continuously from 14th December 1364 to 14th March 1375–6.[5] From his death to 20th October 1377 the office of Chamberlain was vacant, and the revenue was collected by John Mercer.[6]

John Lyon, of Glammis, husband of Jean, daughter of Robert II., 1377 to 1382,[7] in which year he was slain by Sir James Lindsay of Crawford at Moss of Balhall, in revenge, it is said, for his ingratitude for signal benefits conferred on him.[8]

Robert Earl of Fife and Menteith, afterwards Duke of Albany, had the office conferred on him on the death of Sir John Lyon, and retained it till 1406.
